[THE MIRROUR FOR MAGISTRATES, AS] A WINTER NIGHT'S VISION:
Being an addition of such Princes especially famous, who were exempted in the former Historie.

PART IV.

By RICHARD NICCOLS,
Oxon. Mag. Hall.

From the edition imprinted by Felix Kyngston, 1610.
TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE, the Lord Charles Howard,
Earle of Nottingham, Baron of Epsom, Knight of the noble Order of the Garter, Lord high Admirall of England, Ireland and Wales, &c. one of his Maiestie's most Honorable privie
Councell.

As once that done (true honor's aged lord)
Houering with wearied wings about your arke,
When Cadiz towers did fal beneath your sword,
To rest her selfe did single out that barke:
So my meeke muse, from all that conquering rout,
Conducted through the sea's wilde wildernes
By your great selfe, to graue their names about
Th'iberian pillars of Jone's Hercules:
Most humblie craues your lordly lions aid
Gainst monster enuie, while she tels her storie
Of Britaine princes, and that royall maid,
In whose chaste hymne her Clio sings your glorie:
Which if (great lord) you grant, my muse shall frame
Mirrours more worthie your renowned name.

Your Honor's ever most humblie devoted,
RICHARD NICOLS.
TO THE READER.

CIVITIUS Reader, before I enter into the discourse of what I have written, I will acquaint you with the causes why I have written. Having spent some truant hours in the study of this art, and willing to employ my pen to the benefit of mine owne studies, and the profit and pleasure of others, I chanced in reading that worthy work, intituled, The Mirrour for Magistrates, to coniecture, if I should undertake that imperfect historic, that not only experience, the mother of prudence, would furnish my private studies with better judgement; but also that I could not better benefit others, by offering them a taste of the vsauourie fruits of my labours; then by giving them paternes to shun vice and follow vertue: in this coniecture my voluntarie will, not to do nothing, did set such edge vpon my desire, and the presidents of diuers learned, yea, some noble personages, pen-men of that worke, gaue me such encouragement, that though I wanted not judgement to know, that I should want skill to compass it; yet that want of skil, being supplied with good wil to do wel, I have collected the liues of ten famous princes, worthie mirroures, omitted in the former part of this worke: which I present not in their proper places, as I did purpose, but as a part of themselves with dependancie vpon an Induction, that the reader may observe that method of arguments before every life, which I did intend to have continued through the whole worke, if time and mine owne affaires would have suffered me to proceed, but being called away by other employments, I must of force leave it either vnto those, whose good opinion of so worthie an historic, may induce their endeours towards the perfecting of the same, or vntil I shall find occasion hereafter to continue that, now almost finished, which I have left vnnaccomplished; of those ten, which I have penned, the last, though it were written before in the former part, yet for that the matter and stile thereof were generally disliked of M. Ferrers, M. Baldwine, and others: and also for that many principall occurrants in the same were exempted, I haue written againe, placing it in his order, being the last of the ten. In the handling of which, not taking a poetical licence to fashion all things after mine owne fancie, but limiting my selfe within the bounds of an historickall writer, I haue followed those authors, who in the censure of our best judgements are the most authentickall.
For the verse, I haue chosen the fourth proportion, which is the stanza of seuen, preferring it before the sifting, which is the staeffe of eight, because it is chiefly vsed of our ancient and best historickall poets; and though I confesse that of eight to hold better band, yet is it more tedious to a writer, being it binds him to the band of two foures intertangled, which if he observe not, it is no huitaine or staeffe of eight, but falls into the first proportion, making two qua-dreins. To the learned I only write, in whom is my chiefest hope, for that they be learned, a cause sufficient not to doubt any envious construction, being a vice not proper to their good education: whom if I haue pleased, I craue but their good word for my good will; if otherwise, their pardon for my paines. Farewell.
THE INDUCTION.

My muse, that mongst meane birds whilome, did waue her flaggie wing.
And cuckow-like of Castae's wrongs, in rustick tunes did sing,
Now with the mornes cloud climing lark must mount a pitch more hie,
And like Ioue's bird with stedfast lookes outbreaue the sunne's bright eie:
Yea she, that whilome begger-like her beggers ape did sing,
Which iniur'd by the guilt of time to light she durst not bring:
In stately stile tragedian-like with sacred furie fed,
Must now record the tragicke deeds of great Herões dead,
Vouchsafe then thou great king of heau'n, the heau'nyly drops t'infuse
Of sacred iuyce into my pen, gieue strength vnto my muse
To mount aloft with powerfull wings, and let her voice be strong,
That she may smite the golden starres with sound of her great song:
When Ioue-borne Phœbus fierie steeds about the world had bin,
And wearied with their yearely taske, had taken vp their inne
Farre in the south, when cold had nipt the hawthorne's rugged rinde,
And liuely sap of summer sweet, from blast of blustering winde
Had sunken downe into the roote, whose thornie browes besprent
With frostie dew, did hang their heads, and summer's losse lament;
My limbes benumb'd with vnkind cold, my life-blood waxing chill,
As was my wont I walked forth to ease me of such ill:
But when I came in fields abroad, and view'd the wastefull spight
Of wrathfull winter, griev'd I was to see so sad a sight:
The shadie woods, in which the birds to build their neasts were seene,
Whose wauing heads in aire shot vp were crown'd with youthfull greene:
Induction.

Now clad in coat of motlie hue did maske in poore array,
Rough Boreas with his blustering blasts had blowen their leaes away:
In stead of blossomes on the boughes, the spring whilome begun,
Which through the leaes did seeme to laugh vpon the summer's sune,
Now nought but hoarie frost was scene, each branch teares downne did send,
Whose dewie drops on ysiccles vpon each bough depend:
The mistresse of the woods quaint quire, the warbling Philomele,
That wont to rauish with delight, th'inhabitants, that dwell
About the greene wood side, forgot the layes she sung before,
For grieue of summer's golden losse she now could sing no more:
And all the quire that wont with her to beare a part and sing
Concordant discords in sweet straine for welcome of the spring,
Sate silent on the frostie bow, and shuddering all for cold,
Did shroud the head beneath the wing, the day was waxed old,
None but the red-brest and the wren did sing the euen away,
And that in notes of sad record for summer's late decay:
The field, which whilome Ceres crown'd with golden eares of corne,
And all the pasture-springing meades, which Pales did adorne,
Lookt pale for woe, the winterie snow had couered all their greene,
Nought else vpon the grasselesse ground, but winter's waste was scene:
The shepheard's feeble flocke pent vp within the bounded fold,
So faint for food, that scarce their feeete their bodies could vphold,
Did hang the head with beaunie cheare, as they would learne to mourne
The thrall in which they now did liue, by shepheard left forlorn:
All sweet delight of summer past, cold winter's breath had blasted,
The sunne in beau'n shone pale on earth to see her wombe so wasted:
All which, as I grieu'd at such sight, the fields alone did range,
Did teach me know all things on earth were subiect vnto change:
How fonde (me thought) were mortall men, the trustlesse stay to trust,
Of things on earth, since heere on earth all things returne to dust.
Induction.

Who so in youth doth boast of strength, me thought the loftie oak
Would teach him that his strength must vade, when age begins to yoke
His youthfull necke, euens by it selfe, his leauie lockes being shed,
And branched armes shrunke vp with frost, as if they had been dead:
The louely lillie, that faire flower for beautie past compare,
Whom winter's cold keene breath had kill'd, and blasted all her faire,
Might teach the fairest vnder heau'n, that beautie's freshest greene
When spring of youth is spent, will vade, as it had never been;
The barren fields, which whilome flower'd as they would never fade,
Inricht with summer's golden gifts, which now been all decay'd,
Did shew in state there was no trust, in wealth no certaine stay,
One stormie blast of frowning chance could blow them all away;
Out of the yeares alternate course this lesson I did con,
In things on earth of most aucile assurance there was none:
But fancie feeding on these thoughts, as I alone did wend,
The clocke did strike, whose chime did tell the day was at an end;
The golden sunne, daies guide, was gone, and in his purple bed
Had laid him downe, the heau'ns about their azure curtaines spread,
And all the taper lighted were, as t'were the watch to keepe,
Lest past her houre night should vsurpe, while he secure did sleepe:
Then clad in cloaie of mistie foggess the darke night vp did come,
And with grim grislie looke did seeme to bid me get me home;
Home was I led, not as before with solace from the field,
The wofull waste of summer past had all my pleasure spill'd:
When home I came, nipt with sharpe cold of Boreas bitter aire,
After repast to my warme bed forthwith I made repaire,
Where, for the nights were tedious grownen, and I disturb'd in mind
With thoughts of that daies obiect scene, not vnto sleepe inclin'd,
I vp did sit, my backe behind the pillow soft did stay,
And call'd for light, with booke in hand to passe the time away;
Of which each line which I did reade, in nature did agree
With that true vse of things which I the day before did see.
Induction.

A Mirrour hight for Magistrates, for title it did beare,
In which by painfull pens, the fals of princes written were:
There, as in glasse, I did behold, what day before did show,
That beautie, strength, wealth, world's vaine pompe, and all to dust do go:
There did I see triumphant death beneath his feet tread downe
The state of kings, the purple robe, the scepter and the crowne:
Without respect with deadly dart all princes he did strike,
The vertuous and the vicious prince to him been both alike:
Nought else they leave vntouched of death except a vertuous name,
Which dies, if that the sacred nine eternize not the same:
Why then (ye thrice three borne of Ioue) why then be ye despis'd?
Is vertue dead? hath dainty ease in her soft armes surpris'd
The manhood of the elder world? hath rust of time denour'd
Th'Herœ's stocke that on your heads such golden blessings shou'd?
This silent night, when all things lie in lap of sweet repose,
Ye only wake, the powres of sleepe your eyes do never close,
To shew the sempiternitie, to which their names ye raise
On wings of your immortall verse that truly merit praise:
But where's the due of your desert, or where your learning's meed?
Not only now the baser sprite, whom dunghill dust doth breed,
But they that boast themselves to be in honor's bosome borne,
Disdaine your wisdome, and do hold your sectaries in scorne:
No maruell then, me thought, it was, that in this booke I read,
So many a prince I found exempt, as if their names been dead,
Who for desert amongst the best a place might justly claime:
But who can put on any spirit to memorize the name
Of any dead, whose thanklesse race t'whom learning shapes the leg
In humble wise, yet in contempt bids learned wits go beg?
As thus in bed with booke in hand I sate contemplating,
The humorous night was waxed olde, still silence hush't each thing,
The clocke chim'd twelue, to which as I with listning eares at dend,

As signes of fraile mortalitie all things I apprehend;
Induction.

The daylight past, as life I deem, the night as death to come,
The clocke that chim'd, death's fataill knell, that call'd me to my doome,
Still silence rest from worldly cares, my bed the graue I thinkke,
In which, with heart to heau'n vp-lift, at length I downe did sinke:
Where after still repose when as thin vapors had restrain'd
The mourning powers of common sense, and sleepe each sense enchain'd,
Whether the watchfull fantastie did now in sleepe restore.
The species of things sensible, which I had seen before:
And so some dreame it only was, which I intend to tell,
Or vision sent I le not discusse, to me it thus befell:
A sudden sound of trumpe I heard, whose blast so loud was blowne,
That in a trance I senselesse lay, fraile mortall there was none
That heard such sound, could sense retaine: my chamber wals did shake,
Vp flew the doores, a voice I heard, which thus distinctly spake:
"Awake from sleepe, lift vp thy head, and be no whit dismay'd,
I serve the deities of heau'n, their hests must be obey'd,
And now am sent from her that keepes the store-house of the mind:
The mother of the muses nine, for thee she hath assign'd
For her designe, the night to come in sleepe thou must not spend:
Prepare thy selfe, that gaist she come, her will thou maist attend."
As to these words I listning lay, and had resumed spright,
I boldly looked round about, and loe, there stood in sight
True fame, the trumpet eu of heau'n, that doth desire inflame
To glorious deeds, and by her power eternifies the name:
A golden trumpe her right hand held, which when she list to sound,
Can smite the starres of heau'n, and bring the dead from vnder ground:
Vpon her head a chaplet stood of neuer fading greene,
Which honor gaue, to glie to them that fauour'd of her been:
Her wings were white as snow, with which she compest heau'n and earth
With names of such, whom honor did renowne for deeds of worth:
Induction.

As I beheld her princely port, yet trembling all for fear,
A sound of heav’nly harmony did pierce my pleased ear,
In rapture of whose sweet delight, as I did runish take,
The goddess dread whom fame forespake did stand before mine eye,
The lady of mount Helicon, the great Pierian dame,
From whom the learned sisters nine derive their birth and name,
In golden garments clad she was, which time can never weare,
Nor fretting moth consume the same, which did embroydered beare
The acts of old Herôes dead, set downe in stately verse,
Which sitting by the horse-foot spring, Ioue’s daughters did rehearse:
Fine damsels did attend on her, who with such wondrous skill
Do in their seuerall functions worke, to serue their ladie’s will,
That what she seekes on earth, to see, to heare, smell, taste or touch,
They can present the same with speed, their power and skill are such:

As in amazement at such sight I in my bed did lie,
She thus bespake: “I am,” quoth she, “the ladie Memorie,
Ioue’s welbelou’d Memosyne, that keepes the wealthie store
Of time’s rich treasure, where the deeds that haue been done of yore
I do record, and when in booke I chance to find the same
Of any after death decai’d, I do reuie the same:
Turning the volume large of late, in which my Clio sings
The deeds of worthie Britaines dead, I find that many kings
Exempted are, whose noble acts deserve eternitie,
And amongst our Mirrors challenge place for all posteritie:
For which, my station I haue left, and now am come to thee,
This night thou must abandon sleepe, my pen-man thou must bee.”

To this said I: “O goddess great, the taske thou dost impose
Exceeds the compasse of my skill, t’is fitter farre for those,
Whose pens sweet nectar do distill, to whom the power is giuen
Upon their winged verse to rap their readers vp to heav’n:
The pinions of my humble muse be all too weake to fly
So large a flight; theirs be this taske that loue to soare on high:
Induction.

But how can they such taske vp-take, that in a stately straine
Hane rais'd the dead out of the dust; yet after all their paine,¹
When their sweet muse in vertue's praise hath powred out their store,
Are still despis'd and doom'd for aye with vertue to be poore.²
To this, "alas," quoth Memorie, "it grieues me to behold
The learned wits left all forlorn, t'whom whilome it was told
Magenas was reui'd againe: yet grieue I more to see
The loathed lozell to prophone that sacred mysterie:
Each vulgar wit, that what it is, could never yet define,
In ragged rimes with lips profane, will call the learned nine
To helpe him ytter forth the spawne of his vnfruitfull braine,
Which makes our peerelesse poesie to be in such disclaime,
That now it skils not whether Pan do pipe, or Phebus play,
Tom Tinkar makes best harmonie to passe the time away:
For this I grieue, for this the seed of loue are held in scorne,
Yet not for this our worthies dead are to be left forlorn:
For so no future age should know the truth of things forepast,
The names of their forefathers dead would in the dust be cast:
Then do not thou thy helpe denie, I will conduct thy pen,
And fame shall summon vp the ghosts of all those worthie men,
That mongst our Mirrors are not found, that each one orderly
May come to thee, to tell the truth of his sad tragedie."
Thus hauing said, she tooke the booke from vnderneath my head,
And turning ore the leaues, at last, she thus began to reade.
THE FAMOYS LIFE AND

Death of King Arthur.

THE ARGUMENT.

The first I find exempted in our storie
Is noble Arthur, Albion's ancient glorie,
Who here at home subdues the Saxon kings:
Then forren nations in subjection brings,
The Roman host with Lucius for their guide
To his victorious sword do stoope their pride:
But home-bred broiles call backe the conquering king,
Warres thunder 'bout the Britaine coasts doth ring,
Gawain's firme loyaltie at his last breath,
Arthur's last conquest, wounds and timelesse death,
The truth of which, that we may heare, let fame
Summon his ghost to come and tell the same.
ANOTHER ARGUMENT.

Fame sounds her trumpe, king Arthur doth ascend
Tells Mordred's treason, death, and his owne end.

No age hath bin, since nature first began
To worke Ioue's wonders, but hath left behind
Some deeds of praise for Mirrors vnto man,
Which more then threatful lawes in men inclind,
To tread the paths of praise excites the mind,
Mirrors tie thoughts to vertues due respects,
Examples hasten deeds to good effects.

'Mongst whom, that I my storie so renown'd
May for a Mirrour to the world commend,
Summon'd the first by fame's shrill trumpets sound:
Looe, I am come on earth to find a friend,
Who his assistance vnto me may lend,
And with his pen paint out my historie
A perfect Mirrour of true majestie.
Arthur.

3.
In which the truth of my corrupted storie,
Defac'd by fleeting time's inconstant pen
I will declare, nor to advance my glorie
Will I present vnto the view of men
Ought, but the scope of what the truth hath ben:

Meane time thou pen-man of Mnemowsyne,
Giue heedfull care vnto my tragedie.

As from aire-threatning tops of cedars tall
The leaues, that whilome were so fresh and greene,
In healthlesse autumnne to the ground do fall,
And others in their roomes at spring are seen:
So proudest states amongst the states of men
Now mount the loftie top of fortune's wheele,
Now fall againe, now firmly stand, now reele.

Foure times the state of this same noble Ile
Hath changed been by froward fate's decree,
And on foure nations fortune's front did smile,
Gracing thir high attempts with victorie
Ouer this empire of Great Britanie:
Yet none but one the scepter long did sway,
Whose conquering name endures vntill this day.

First the proud Roman Caesar did oppresse
This land with tributarie seritude:
Next those two Saxon brethren heauen did blesse,
Who in our Brittish blood their blades imbru'd,
And to their lordly will this land subdu'd:
Thirdly the Dane did heere long time remaine,
And lastly Normans ouer vs did raigne.
Arthu.

7.

Thus seest thou fortune's unimpeached force,
And what it hath been in our Britaine state:
By this thou seest her wheelees inconstant course,
And how on earth nor prince, nor potentate,
Can long withstand her ruine-thirsting hate,
Which my true storie's sad catastrophe
Vnto the sonnes of men can testifie.

I am that Arthu, who on honor's wing
Did mount fame's palace 'mongst the worthies nine
Fourth from false Vortigerne th'surping king:
Who, that he might with strong allies combine
His shaken state, which then began decline,
Wretch that he was into this land did bring
The Saxons with hight Hengist their false king.

The sonne I was of Vter that stout knight,
Pendragon called for his policie,
Not in ignoble birth brought forth to light,
Though foes false imputation vilifie
My royall birth with taint of bastardie:
But in true wedlocke's bands a noble dame
Bore me, the fruit of loue without defame.

Whose former husband Goilen, that proud duke,
At Duuilioc in fight my sire strooke dead:
And 'mongst his spoiles Igren the faire he tooke,
With whom he did ascend loue's amorous bed
And lest the fruit of his delight new bred
The time might turne to shame in lawlesse birth,
He took the dame to wife, who brought me forth.
Arthur.

11.
By peeres consent I in my youth began
Upon the throne the supreme sway to beare:
And at that time against the boldest man,
That breath'd on earth my spirit did not feare,
In single fight the combatant t'appeare,
Skilfull I was in knowledge of all fights,
That then was used amongst martiall knights.

And at that time my close-neere fighting men,
The frame of every bloody fight to know,
In martiall feates, haue exercised been,
And every one would 'gainst the forren foe,
With emulation strive their deeds to show,
In courts where kings, adore Bellone's shrine,
There the bright blaze of chivalrie will shine.

Upon the mind, whose glorie-thirsting heart,
By deeds of armes did at true honor aime,
Such edge I set, that from each forren part,
The brood of Mars to Britaine's Arthur came,
Of him to purchase the reward of fame:
And take that order, that I then did found,
Which till this day men call the table round.

Upon this table's superficial part
Statutes ingraven were by my decree,
Vnto the which each man of valiant hart,
That of this famous fellowship would bee
At Camelot by oath did first agree,
And call'd they were amongst our chivalrie
Armes, seuen religious deeds of charitie.
15.
But where is now this honor'd dignitie,
That wont to be the care of noble kind?
Or is it dead, or will nobilitie
Let that, which only was to it assign'd,
Be now polluted by the baser mind?
   Alas the while, that once the best reward
   To vertuous deeds is now of no regard.

No golden churle, no elbow-vanting Jacke,
No peasant base, nor borne of dunghill mould,
Could find such treasure in his pedler's packe
To purchase that, which fame on high did hold
For true desart, aboue the reach of gold:
   This order then dame vertue kept in store
   For such, as did her sacred selfe adore.

In this new flourish of my flower'ring spring,
When honor's hopefull buds appear'd in mee,
And promis'd goodly fruit in time to bring,
My forward thoughts being set on fier, to free
My native land from Saxon tyrannie:
   With phantasie still working 'gainst the foe,
   In sleepe this spectacle to me did show.

As I (me thought) did sit on royall throne
With peers about me set, a ladie faire
In presence came and making pitious mone,
Tearing the tresses of her golden haire,
And wringing both her hands, as if despaire
   Had her bereft of hope her griefe to show,
   With teares did vitter forth these words of woe
"Behold," quoth she, "behold me wretched wight,
The forlorn lady of this noble lie,
From towering state cast down by foes despight,
And of an empress, which I was ere while,
Of Saxon yoke now made a subject vile:
  What bootes it what I was, sith now I am
  The scorn of fortune and the Briton's shame?

O, noble prince, unsheath thy conquering blade
And save that little, which is left to mee,
Left not for aye my ancient glory vade,
Nor let me subject lieue, as thus you see,
To pride of barbarous foes, but set me free;"
  Thus ended she her plaint, and in sad plight
  With piteous looks departed from my sight.

The phantasie presenting everie howre
The appearance of such thoughts did so excite
My furies, against the foe, that all my powre
I musted for the field, and Howel, bright
Of little Britaine prince, a valiant knight,
  Allide to me by blood, did cross the maine
  To purchase honor with his martiall traine.

Here could I sing the deeds of warre to thee,
Whereby my famous conquests thou should know,
How heauen did grace me with such victorie,
That in twelve battles I did overthrow
The mightie forces of my warlike foe:
  And by my valor, how I did expell
  Those Saxon foes, which here long time did dwell.
Hight Colgrim greatest amongst Saxon kings
I first subdu'd with honour'd victorie,
But happie he vpon the wind-like wings
Of hastie speed to saue himselfe did fly
Ouer the seas broad backe to Germanie:
    Yet could he not escape vntimely death,
    But here in Britaine breath'd he his last breath.

Vnto his friends, when he in safetie came,
He could not shun th'edict of destinie:
But backt by them he proudly did proclame
T'inferrre swift vengeance on our Britannie,
If he were not restor'd to dignitie:
    Which I disdain'd and did prepare for fight:
    Because to that he claim'd he had no right.

And in a faire field by those bathes apart,
Which Bladul sometimes king of Britanie
Had founded by the depth of powerfull art,
My tents I pight: for there did fates decree,
That great king Colgrims ouerthrow should bee:
    Whose mightie force my folke at first did dread,
    Which by three kings was in Battalia led.

For first did Bladul brother to this king,
Conduct the vaunt gard for this valiancie,
Next Chelderick vnto the field did bring
His Germaine powers, the strokes of death to trie,
Who was a mightie prince in Germanie,
    And in the rereward Colgrims selfe did lead
    The Picts to fight, a people full of dread.
Arthur.

27.
The battailes join'd, each aduerse part opposde
Their strength to strength, the aire with dreadfull sound
Of soldier's shouts did echo as they clos'd,
And each one equalie gaue wound for wound,
Till with the foes fresh strength, which did abound,
My men opprest to flight began to fall,
Whom thus with mowing words I did recall.

"Yee emptie harted sonnes of Brute," quoth I,
"Not worthie valiant Brutus farre-spreed name,
What great defame of your big formes will file
Throughout this world's whole round, if this great shame
Of shamefull flight, yee doe not streight reclame?
Where will ye boldly fight and scornie recoile,
If not in fight for your owne natuie soyle?"

29.
Are these th'effects of those same glorious words,
With which of late your tongues did oft abound,
Saying one hundred with their powerfull swords
A thousand hartlesse foemen should confound,
To your owne shame, alas, this shall redown'd,
Vnlesse with speed ye turne courageous hed,
And make them flie from whom yee lately fled."

30.
All th'host applauding my high valiancie
With deepe impression of my words being driuen,
Did break into the midst of th'enemie,
Where cufse for cufse on either side was giuen,
The noise of which flew echoing vp to heauen,
And with the thunder claps of clashing armes
Made aire to sigh with sound of humane armes.

VOL. II.
31.
The skirmish burn'd, both parts did equall beare
Their heads aloft in this daye's bloodie fight,
All stood it out, none stoopt to seruile feare,
Their swords made mutuall wounds, and in their sight
Their friends each where in field lay rest of light:
The earth made drunke with blood did then abound,
With fruities of death thick strow'd vpon the ground.

32.
But when the trampling steedes of heauen's bright sun
Fell to the seas and left Olympus steepe,
And when the king of flames began to run
His golden head into the waue deep,
When out of east bright Venus gan to peep,
Our strength increast, which conquest did diuine,
Our foes shrunke back, their valor did decline.

For when king Colgrim by my launce strook dead,
And Bladuff by my power cast downe as low,
With their gigantike bulkes the earth did spread,
The foes with one consent their backes did show,
To saue each other in that common woe:
With whom hight Chelrike fled, who for the spoile
Of this our land had left his native soile.

Who being shrouded with the night's black wing,
Trusting that she would his designements hide,
Tooke towards the marrin strand, in hope to bring
His folk disperst, in darknesse vndescride,
Vnto his ships, which then at shore did ride:
But death betwixt them and their nauie stood,
Our native earth drunk vp their stranger blood.
Arthur.

35.
The stout duke Cador, that illustrate knight,
Pursu'd the fier till the rising sun
Describe the foes, who turning from their flight,
Both parts stood firme, the fight afresh begun:
But Cheldrik lost, the conquest Cador wonne,
Whose spoilfull sword did spare no foes in death,
For Cheldrick's self did there expire his breath.

Meane time to rescue that bold Britaine king,
Prince Howell, king of little Britanie,
Who ore the gulfsie flood his folke did bring,
T'assist vs against our common enemie:
Towards Scotland's bounds wee marched speedilie,
Where against the barbarous Picts he was the barre,
While against the Saxon we did wage the warre.

37.
But he vnable to sustaine their force,
Which th'Irish Guillamore, th'assistant king,
In person did support with foote and horse,
Of whose alarmes the countrie round did ring,
Did send to vs requiring vs to bring
Our powers, with expedition to suppress
The foe's haut pride, and succour his distresse.

Of which when I did heare, as from the skie
A tempest stooping on the deepe's profound,
Hurles waues on waues in heapes, and makes them fie
Before his rage, so with the horrid sound
Of dreadfull warre into the Pictish bound
I entred with my host, and in the way
For fire and sword made all the passage pray.
39.
The foe's stout pride we did in field subdued,
And Gwillamore, that did escape the sight,
To his own kingdom's bounds we did pursue,
Where we did bring him to his heart's despight,
Upon his knees by war's impulsive might,
Forcing him yield obedience to our crown,
By golden tribute yearly paid vs downe.

40.
After this good success, perceiving well,
That heaven with sunshine looks grac'd our affairs,
My hopeful heart with glory gan to swell,
Bidding me seek by fame in forren warres,
To fixe my name amongst the golden starres,
And leave a name on earth to live for aye,
When rapt in mould my limbs forgotten lay.

This stout suggestion of my mighty mind,
Made me despise foule ease and pleasures light,
Which softens th'heart, strikes strong desier blind,
Drownes all eternitie in depth of night,
And leaves reproch for prize of such delight:
For fame liues not, except for vertue's merit,
Deeds of delight on earth no place inherit.

A king, that only liues a king in name,
That dull'd with ease and drown'd in fancie's lust,
Can stile his title with no deed of fame,
Being dead, his name iron-eating time shall rust
And in the end obscure it in the dust,
When he, though meane, that vertue's race doth runne,
Doth liue eterniz'd like th'immortall sunne.
Arthur.

43.
This was the winde that set my ships on saile,
In forren shoares true honor to obtaine,
This was the prize, for which with prosperous galle,
I plow'd my passage through the liquid maine
Vnto the Arctike pole, where Charles his waine
Fixt fast in heauen, his station there doth keepe
With other starres neare dining to the deepe.

And there in that cold iland Island call'd,
Whose mountaine with high heads did heauen aspire,
Which white with snow as if they had been bald
Did yet breath forth blacke smoakes and burning fire,
A wonder strange for humaine sense t'admire,
    I with my Britaines bold bore to the Strand
And vncontrol'd march't vp into the land.

Whose people rude and liuing in their kind,
As beasts that wander in the desert field,
The rationall and best part of the mind
In use of heauenly things not being skill'd
Against blind ignorance the soule to shield,
    We did in fight subdue, and by strong hand
Did them enforce to stoope to our command.

Their king Matuasis noting well the oddes
Twixt vs and them in feasts of martill skill,
And finding, that no place of safe abodes
Was left to him, in feare of future ill
Did soone submit himselfe vnto our will,
    And from that time vnto my name's renowne
Did yeeld obedience to the Britaine crowne.
47.
The fame of this exploit being set on wing,
And through the isles adjacent taking flight,
Doldauius of the Gotland nation king,
And great Gunfacus king of Orkney hight
Despairing to oppose our force in fight,
Did yeeld to hold their crownes and dignitie
By tribute to the Britaine emperie.

But should I into light assay to bring
Each fight then fought and euerie deed of worth,
Had I the strength of thousand tongues to sing,
Or the shrill trumpe of fame to echo forth
My conquests, in those islands of the north,
Yet would the glasse of time be quite outrun
Before that true report her part had done.

Should I relate the many a field I fought
Against Aschillius that bold Danish king,
And 'gainst proud Lot the Norway king so stout,
Whom after thousand soules being set on wing,
We at the length did in subjection bring:
Scarce would the eares of fraile mortalitie
Give credit to our noble historic.

50.
Yet thinke, what dread of death and dangerous wounds
We in those trouels then might vndergoe,
From Albion's rockes vnto the Russian bounds,
And our great conquest 'gainst the northerne foe,
The fame of our admir'd exploits will show:
For to the Lap-land kingdome's vmost end,
Our Britaines empire's bounds I did extend.
Arthur.

51.
In deeds of fame, thus did I spend the prime
Of goden youth, which lul'd in pleasure's bed,
Flies fast away vpon the wings of time,
And scarce is knowne t'haue bin, when th'hoarie bed
With white of wintric age is ouersped:
For age with shame of youth's fond deeds strooke blind,
Doth oft abhorre to beare the same in mind.

52.
Who doth to sloth his yonger daies ingage
For fond delight, he clips the wings of fame:
For sloth the canker-worme of honor's badge,
Fame's fethered wings doth fret, burying the name
Of vertue's worth in dust of dunghill shame,
Whom action out of dust to light doth bring
And makes her mount to heauen with golden wing.

After my high atchievements in the north
I being returned to my natuie land,
Fame through the world did so renowne the worth
Of these deeds done by my victorious hand,
That greatest kings did in amazement stand,
Strooke blind in looking at the sunshine blaze
Of my great worth, yet enuying at my praise.

54.
For when true vertue's glorious excellence,
Mounts vp aloft, and like the sun in skies,
Breakes through the clouds of darksome ignorance,
Then enuie rous'd from her darke den doth rise,
And dazel'd with the golden shine, that flies
From vertue's splendor, seekes t'obscure the same,
And muffle it in her blacke clouds of shame.
That envious beast of twice five hornes of might,
Who oer the world did long time tyrannize,
From Rome's high towers viewing the golden light
Of my great fame, which dazzled her weake eies,
Selve swoone with haughty pride, rows'd vp did rise,
And at my state with her proud hornes did push,
In hope my fame being yet but young to crush.

The Roman king that bore great Cæsar's name,
Twelve aged sires in senate did select,
Men of renowne and all of noble fame,
Who as grue legats his great will t'effect,
Through Neptune's waue empire did direct
Their course to our sea-bounded Britannie,
To menace vs with their proud ambasie.

Where when they came, seeing our court abound,
With honor's sones emploi'd in deeds of fame,
Not in still wanes of court-deepe pleasures drown'd:
For use in deeds of armes and martiall game
Exiling sloth the pride of lust doth tame:
They thought their antique Romane emperie,
Had been transferr'd from Rome to Britannie.

Yet getting audience one amongst the rest,
With grue demeanor and great maistrie,
Thinking with words our greatnesse t'haue represt,
Began t'unfold with high authoritie,
The thundring threatnings of his ambasie:
For he vnbidden boldly tooke his place,
And thus did threaten me vnto my face.
"Arthur," said he, "from ample-streeted Rome
Where mightie Caesar thy liege lord doth reigne
T’effect his will, to thee, loe, we are come,
And in his name to claime our right againe,
Which wrongfullie from vs thou dost detaine:
For long time since ye Britaines well do know
That Britanie to Rome did tribute owe.

60.
He doth dislike thy farre commanding minde,
Nor thy proud bold attempts will he allowe
In any thing, by him not being design’d,
By vs he bids thy haughtie stomack bowe
Vnto the bended of his kingly browe,
And wils thy kingdom stoop, though so renown’d,
To Rome, the mistris of the world’s wide round.

But if thy hart do harbor haughtie pride,
And that thy people still stiffnecked bee,
If that our words in scorne thou set aside,
Then to thy face I here do threateth thee,
That ere thine eyes one summer more shall see,
More troopes of men gainst thee we will imploie.
Then erst did Greekes against the sonnes of Troy.”

This threatening speech did set my thoughts on fire,
And made me to returne this sharpe replie:
"Doting old wretch," said I, "thou dost aspire
In vaine by vanting words to terrifie
The hart of him that scornes thy ambasie,
Nor can our person patiently permit
Those barbarous taunts, signes of thy doting wit."
Do Romaines harbor such a base conceit
That Britains Arthur is of lesse renowne
Then is their king, in empire, though so great?
Or that usurping Caesar with a frowne
Can make vs yeeld the title of our crowne?
O silly sots to thinke vs such a sort
As your base speeches whilom did import.

Is not our noble nation by descent
Sprung from the warlike Troian's roiall race?
And shall our thoughts be then so baselie bent,
As with subjection seruillie t'embrace
The yoke of loftie Rome the world's disgrace?
Her fame shall fall, our Britaine state shall rise,
She ore the world no more shall tyrannize.

With swiftest speed returne thou this replie,
That we a people free will still maintaine
'Gainst all the world our ancient libertie,
And that thou well maist know how wee disdaine
The seruile yoke of Rome's insulting reigne,
Ile bring reuenge, which Rome shall neuer shun
For that great scath which Caesar here hath done."

This said, they all amaz'd at my replie
Dismist, made no abode in this our land:
But with winde-winged sailes did swiftly sile
Ouer the depths of Neptune's high command,
Of whom their Caesar soone did understand
How his command with scorne we did deride,
In tempting our disdaine with such vaine pride,
Arthur.

67.
A which inrag'd, he in a fatall houre
The tribune Lucius for the warre design'd,
Who into France came downe with all his power,
Where many legionaries he did finde
Vnto that quarter of the world assign'd,
To keepe it peacefull by wart's threatfull stroke,
Which then began to shake off Roman yoke.

And as he did prepare to greedie fight,
So did we arme vnto the bloodie field
And from each quarter of our land did cite
All such as able were with strength to wield
Or launce, or bowe, or dart, or sword and shield,
Whom we did muster vp in armes well dight
To make them apt and skilfull for the fight.

69.
And in our absence in those forren warres,
To guard our state against all aduersse feare,
We left at home to manage all affaires,
Mordred the brother of my Gawin deare,
Our faithlesse nephew, that false hearted peere,
Th'ignoble sonne of Loth the Pictish king:
From whose blacke treason my sad fall did spring.

70.
Whose loyaltie I little did suspect,
Though on my death his hopes did then depend:
But who so wise hath been that can detect
The meanes and houre, by which the fates intend
To mortall life to adde the finall end?
Though both the meanes and houre most certaine bee,
Yet most vncertaine is the time's decre.
But being most secure of future chance,
My thoughts to meete the foes being set on wing,
Who did ordaine, that Augustence in France
Should be the place for each assistant king,
Unto the Romane aid their powers to bring:
With warre's loud trumpe from all parts of the land,
I call'd my Britaines downe unto the strand.

Where our blacke barkes all readie furnish't lay,
In which departing from the barren shore,
Wing'd with full gale, the ships did force their way,
So swiftly with their bending bulkes before,
That 'bout their breasts the gluing waues did rore,
Through which we kept our course without miscance,
And did at Harflew safe arrive in France.

Where thousands troop't in armes the shoares did show
Sent from those princes by allegiance bound,
T'assist vs in our warres against the foe,
Who when our feet did presse the sandie ground,
Did welcome our approch with shouts loud sound:
In every place Bellona loud did sing,
Of horse and foot the countrie round did ring.

Our powers being ioyne'd and enerie seuerall band
Digested for the fght, without delay
We marched from the salt sea's slimie strand,
And sent our scouts before vs in the way,
To know where Lucius host encamped lay:
But hearing nought we forward did advance,
Vntill we came to Augustence in France.
Arthur.

And there upon a chosen plot of ground
The Roman host with their especiall aides
Arm'd in strong steele for fight prepar'd we found,
The blaze of whose bright shields and glittering blades,
Did cast a sunshine in the darkest shades:
With whom we thought t'haue then begun the fight,
Had setting sun not shew'd approching night.

But when from vnderneath the siluer vaile
Of Thetis lap Apollo did arise,
And to the batlements of heau'n exhale
Night's dewie drops, which fell before from skies,
Our bands t'applie for fight we did devise,
And euerie one did buckle to the field,
Thirsting to bloodie fight their strength to yeild.

Then did the trumpet shrill sound out alowd
To bring them bold to the insatiate field,
And on the plaine both parts in thickest crowd
Opposing sword to sword and shield to shield,
Not fear'd with death, but with stout courage fild,
Began the fight, and none their backs did turne,
In euerie place the skirmish hot did burne.

But where the kinglie eagle Ioue's faire bird
Great Caesar's standard did maintaine the fight,
There both on horse and foote the slaughtering sword
Made greatest hauock, where with most affright
To my bold Britons, Lucius, that stout knight,
Did beate the field or turning troops of men,
As if the battaile onlie there had ben.
79.
Which when I heard, with my victorious lance
Thirsting to do where deeds of worth were done,
I towards that part my standard did advance,
The virgin mother of great Ioue's owne sonne,
Vnder whose badge I many a field had wone,
   Where 'mongst the foes I rush'd with my bold bands,
   T'auenge my slaughtered friends at Lucius' hands.

Then prudent Ioue vpon the foes did frowne,
And in his ballance holding either fate
Of both our fortunes, made their lot sinke downe,
Vpon our steps in fight did conquest wait,
Death's terror did the foe-men's strength abate,
   Whose hands fell strengthlesse downe, being all inclin'd
   To flie with shame, and leave vs fame behind.

They fled, and we did eager pursuit make:
But sad report on fame's vnluckie wing,
With fatall tidings did vs ouertake,
How all our Britaine ocean round did ring
With Mordred's deeds aspiring to be king,
   Which strooke more terror to my grieved mind,
   Then if the world 'gainst me in armes had shin'd.

82.
Yet with late conquest won in mind made bold,
Returning to our fleet we launcht from land,
And being out at sea we might behold
Our owne rebellious kingdome's rockie strand,
Strengthen'd about the coast with many a band:
   Which did my vexed soule with sorrow sting,
   To see false subiects bent to braue their king.
Arthur.

83.
As lions rob'd of yong with hideous rore
All raging wood, makes the echoing forest shake
And beasts to dread: so sailing towards the shore,
My soldiers charging, with loud shouts did make
The stoutest hearts on th'adverse part to quake:
   A wrongfull cause makes fortitude give backe,
   And guilt of treason courage doth aslacke.

Yet on the land at Sandwich port, before
We could set foot, we lost much life and blood:
For with stones, darts, and shafts thicke sent from shore,
Our men as on the deckes they stoutly stood
Were overturn'd into the waue flood,
   'Mongst whom without all helpe before our eyes,
   Did many sinke, and never more did rise.

For many 'mongst the rest being wounded sore,
Rising againe, to shun their timeless graue,
Their fainting browes aboue the billowes bore,
And when their lips did overlooke the waue,
For helpe cri'd out their louted liues to saue:
   But they, alas, made weake, with losse of blood,
   Sinking, poore soules, were strangl'd in the flood.

To wreake such harms with sharpened arrowes store,
Steele-headed iauelins, stones and singing darts,
We charg'd the bold defendants on the shore,
Which did impresse deepe wounds in their best harts,
And made the rest retire t'escape such smarts,
   From whom our men the firme land hauing won,
   'Twixt them and vs a dreadful fight begun.
87.
Where noble Anguisell the Scotish king,
Amidst the foes in fight incircled round,
Did in our cause endure death’s fatal sting;
And valiant Cador after many a wound,
Did sink downe dead upon the flowerie ground:
Whom my deare Gawin did consort in death,
And in our right, with them expir’d his breath.

For making slaughter with his mightie lance
Upon the adverse troopes, though many a band
Inclos’d him from all helpe, where he by chance
Was wounded by a fatall soouldier’s hand,
Yet ’gainst them all alone he made his stand,
And with his life halfe spent in their despight,
Did make retreate vnto his tent from fight.

89.
Where through his wound, before his life did fleet,
These words hee spake vnto the standers by,
"With sad farewell my soueraigne I doe greet,
In whose defence against his foes, though I
In death triumphant over death do die,
Yet brother’s treason wounds my heart with woe,
For which with griefe vnto my grave I goe.

Ye powers of heauen, on whose dispose divine
The gift of conquest doth depend alone,
Let our dread king in bataille victor shine
Against his foes, let traytors falling groane
Beneath his sword, that do aspire his throne:
But cease my words, death doth my breath exhale,
Adue my liege, I die, my life doth faile."
This said, he slept in death, yet never sleeps
The fame of his admired loyalty,
Seal'd with his blood, record for ever keeps,
His name a mirror of true constancy
To his liege lord for all posterity:
    For vnto us he in true loyal love
    Gainst nature's selfe to death did constant prove.

Nature's affections cruel'd by rule of reason,
The due respect of common good doth binde
Gainst nature's selfe, and when the hand of treason
Inuades the state of kings, the noble minde
To shun the taint of blood 'gainst their owne kinde,
    Adverse in nature seeme, that love to showe,
    Which first to care of common good they owe.

Which this illustrate knight in hart did keepe,
And with his blood in death did scale the same:
Which when I heard sad sorrowe seatin deep,
In my grieu'd hart my thoughts did so inflame,
That on the foes I rush't with loud exclame,
    And with heroicke wreake my harte's true love
To my deare Gawin dead, I did approue.

In our revenge such slaughter we did make
With furious onset on the aduerse part,
That vnto flight themeselves they did betake,
Nor durst the brest that bore the boldest hart
Stand forth 'gainst vs to shake his threatening dart:
    False traytor's hearts the coward's feare doth feele,
Nor can an edge be set vpon their steele.
Arthur.

95.
The Saxon Cerdicus and Mordred both
Confederates in this treason ’gainst our state,
Did flie t’escape the meed of their vnroth,
Whom we did fast pursue with deadly hate
From place to place, vntill vntimely fate
Did by one battell shut vp all our strife
In Mordred’s death, and losse of my deare life.

A second field at Winchester we won,
Where many foes in fight were stricken dead,
’Mongst whom false Mordred his blacke death did shun,
Who with his friends although from field he fle’d:
Yet t’hazard fortune once more he made bed,
And on a plaine by Glastenburie towne,
Fatall to all this land his tents pight downe.

97.
Whom I as one, that of his owne accord
Had sought to hasten death in armes bedight,
In person follow’d with renengefull sword,
To shew my selfe as well the first in fight,
As first in name, though with respectue right
To common good, whose state depended then
Vpon my life: I might haue absent ben;

98.
Yet could not this disswade me from the field,
But in the morne when as the daie’s bright king
The mountaine tops with golden shine did gild,
No sooner did the warlike trumpet sing
Warre’s fearfull song, the sound of which did ring
About my eares, but rous’d from rest I rose,
And arm’d me for the field to meet my foes.
Arthur.

99.
With trumpet's blast Bellona summon'd out
My Britons to the field, and then began
Each severall band t'enranke themselues about
My royall standard, while each captaine ran
From troope to troope enabling euerie man
  To charge the rebels with their utmost might,
  Who in the field stood brauing vs for fight.

100.
With trumpets, drums and dreadful shouts of men
The battailes ioyn'd, earth's batter'd pauements under
Did seeme to shake, heauen sounded lowd, as when
Bold Boreas clad in darknesse, stormes and thunder,
Doth cuffe the cloudes and rends their ribs in sunder:
  Both parts being eager bent the day to winne,
  The fight at first with furie did begin.

101.
And as the hunter his shrill horn doth winde,
Breaths forth lowd shoutes and vseth all his art
To make his dogs to pinch the game behinde:
So euerie where I cheer'd vp euerie hart,
And urg'd my men against the aduerse part,
  Exciting them by mine owne valiancie
  To charge through death for fame and victorie.

102.
So long as faire Aurorae's light did shine,
All valiantlie themselues in fight did beare:
But when the king of flames began decline
From steepe Olympus top, th'whole host with feare
Affrighted was, all troopes disorderd were,
  Who giuing back from field had fled awaye,
  If I through death, had not regain'd the day.
Arthur.

103.

For loe, a Pictish soouldier amongst the foes
Spake in the British tongue: "Yeeld (O friends) yield,
No more your selues to death in vaine oppose,
Arthur is dead, and with him dead in field
His knights are laid, on whom our hopes did build:"
This spake he with lowd voice in th'heate of fight,
Thereby to turne our bataile into flight:

But I that heard and knew his close intent,
In front of all the field my selfe did show
Whereby my Britons, that before were bent
To turne their backes, turn'd head vpon the foe,
'Twixt whom the fight againe did fervent grow,
With whom I brake into the dangerous fight
In hope to meet with Mordred, that false knight.

105.

My lance and sword did many a bosome sacke
Of life's rich spoiles, which were all men of name,
The common sort my hand in troopes did wrack,
For through deep wounds and death in martiall game
I did enforce my way to win me fame,
Till wounded in the head with fatall speele
My death's approch in fight I gan to feele.

106.

Yet when warme blood through my craukt veins flow,
And subtle aire gan pierce the liuely braine,
The eager anguish did my valor show:
For manie foemen in my furie slaine
Did pay my wreake with death and deadlie baine:
Still did I fight, although with fainting breath,
Untill in fight I heard of Mordred's death.
Arthur.

107.
Whose tragick fall when true report did tell,
His soldierns fled away, and in their flight
Vp flew their hecles, in slaughter fast they fell,
Darts thick as haile their backs behinde did smite,
Farre more in chase did fall, then in the fight:
    Yea none had scap't the furie of that day
    Had not my bleeding wounds stood in my way.

In manie a fight before in death's despight
Vpon my head ten wounds I did sustaine,
With life vntoucht: but in this fatall fight
Remorslesse fate to end my life and reigne
With one deepe wound did wound my vitall braine:
    For in the chace with torment of that wound
    Death's touch I felt and fell vpon the ground.

109.
From whence conuei'd to Glastenburie by
By my deare friends, who did in vaine pretend
To saue my life, loe, as I there did lie
In th'armes of death, perceiving how each friend
Did shew his ruth, in teares for my sad end,
    These words I spake, before my vading breath
    Did fled away vpon the wings of death.

110.
"Grieue not," said I, "to see your wounded king
Wrapt in the ruine of his life now done:
For Phoenix-like from death new life shall spring,
Which in this life I by my death haue wonne,
I dead, that left to liue, when I am gone,
    Yea, this in death shall liue my future grace,
    I di'd a conquerour in cold death's embrace."
Arthur.

111.
The kingly ruth which our sad soule attends
Is our deare crowne's sight, which setted deepe
In depth of my deare loue (O noble friends)
To you I tender 'gainst all spoile to kepe,
When I in peace haue laid me down to sleepe,
Death now triumphs, my mortall daies are done,
My houre is spent, my glasse is quite outrun."

112.
This said, when I twice thirteene yeares had been
The stout defendant of my crowne's right,
My soule did leave th'abodes of mortall men,
My lieuesse limbes in secret hid from sight,
Interred were at Glastenburie hight:
Thus hast thou heard the truth of all my storie,
My life, my death, and my nere dying glorie.

113.
In which as in a glasse, seeing men may see
That action only dignifies the name,
That vertue betters every bare degree,
That vading pleasures vpshot is but shame,
And silent sloth the opposite to fame,
Commit to mind, what I commend to thee,
That vnto men a Mirrour it may bee.
THE LIFE AND DEATH
of King Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

THE ARGUMENT.

"This was a worthie prince," quoth Memorie,
"Peerelesse amongst the kings of Britanie,
After whose death the British rule did cease,
And th’English power did more and more increase:
For not long after on the Britaine throne
The Saxon kings did rule and raigne alone,
Who did at first agree in one consent
To make seuen kingdomes of this regiment,
Which did in that confused sort remaine
Till the beginning of king Egbert’s raigne:
About which time from Denmarke with strong hand
Ingwe and Hubba came t’invade this land,
With whom the Saxons manfully did fight,
And turn’d them oftentimes to coward flight:
Yet did they here long time beare great command,
Though many a valiant king did them withstand,
’Mongst whom I find this one, whose tragedie
Is not recited in our historie,
Which Edmund call’d, surnamed Ironside,
A famous prince, in battell often tride,
Whom fortune still did grace with victorie
In fight against Cnut’s his enemie:
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

Yet by the cruel fates vniust command
He lost his life by wicked traytor’s hand,
Whom vp from graue let fame with summons call,
To take his turne and tell his tragicke fall.”

Fame calles vp Edmund from his graue below,
His life and lamentable death to show.

Intending private weale, when life is
Vading away, leave no record behind.
In fame's faire booke, for future age to find:
    Self-love to private good, no good can crave,
    When life is gone such love lies dead in graue.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

2.
The fruits of love, which after life do liue,
To grow from love of common good are seen,
To reape such fruit, whose his life shall give,
Though dead, yet liues: his fruit aye waxeth green;
Of which my life a Mirrour might have been:
But whose sad Muse my tragedie doth sing,
Or who to light king Edmund's deeds doth bring?

3.
Now from my graue, the bed of my long rest
Rous'd vp by fame, through shades of silent night,
Behold I come obeying her behest,
As Mirrors vnto men, to bring to light
My deeds, oft done in my deare countrie's right:
Heare then (thou sleeping wight) whose mournfull Muse
To sing my storie Memorie doth chuse.

I am the sonne of that vnhappy king
Hight Egbert, whose daies were wrapt in woe,
And on whose head false fortune downe did fling,
Such miserable scath and overthrow,
That he was forc'd his kingdom to forgo:
For subiect's treacherie did him constraine
To leave his kingdom vnto bloodie Swaine.

To bloodie Swaine, who from our Albion shore
Vnto the Norman duke to saue his life,
Forc'd him to flie, whose sister he, before
My mother dead, had made his second wife,
In hope thereby t'appease domestick strife,
And by the aid of Norman valiancie,
To quell the force of forren enemy.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

6.
But hence did rise the ruine of the state,
And fourth decay of Albion's emperie,
This was the gap, which by decree of fate
Was open laid for time's posteritie,
Vnto the Norman conquerer's victorie:
   For by these fatall nuptials in the end,
   The Norman duke his title did pretend.

7.
My sire being thus constrain'd by forren force,
And subject treason, in such miserie,
Amongst his Norman friends to seekc remorke
Of his mishaps, the land meane time did lie
Groaning beneath the victor's tyrannie,
   For nere did captiu'd men sustaine such woes,
   As did the english of the conquering foes.

O noble England, nurse of my renowne,
Queene of all ilands canoped of heauen,
How was thy towring state then troden downe?
How were thy sonnes from their sad mother druen?
Thy daughter's beautie vnto rapine giuen?
   My words, alas, will thy sad heart compell
   To bleed with woe, these woes to heare me tell.

The simple hinde, who with day-labour stroue
In fruitlesse field to furrow vp his bread,
Nor for himselfe the earth with paine did proue,
But for another, whom his labour fed,
Although in heart he often wisht him dead,
   In euer house lord Dane did then rule all,
   Whence laysie lozels lurdanes now we call.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

10.
The nuptiall bed, the lodge of chaste delight,
Was common vs'd in wedlocke's foule disdaine,
Sweet virgins daily forc'd to deeds of night,
Faire ladies beautie set to sale for gaine,
Children made bondslaves, wretched husbands slain,
   Who to such rufall spoile were lustly giuen
   For their offence against the king of heauen.

Let such, whose peacefull eares from sad affright
Of warre's dread voice the hand of heauen doth close,
Who lull'd in that dame's lap of sweet delight,
The queene of peace do sleepe secure of foes,
Thinke it humane, to thinke on other's woes:
   And in such thoughts fear such like woes to come,
   For their offence ordain'd by Ioue's iust doome.

12.
The life of state lay stifled in the smoke
Of blanke despaire, till death tooke life from Swaine,
Then th'english peeres shooke off the heauie yoke
Of forren pride, which they did erst sustaine,
And did recall my father home againe,
   Who did enforce by power of his strong hand
   Canute the sonne of Swaine to leaue this land.

13.
Then did he seeke to reerect againe
The ruines of his crowne's collapsed state:
But he, t'whom at his birth heauen did ordaine
In all his deeds inevituable fate
Of bad euent, euen to his daie's last date
   His wishfull hopes in vaine did seeke t'advance,
   Vpon th'vnsteadie wheele of fickle chance.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

14.
For eke those sprightfull horse of heauenly breed,
That draw the chariot of the golden sunne,
Who day by day do vse their swiftest speed
From east to west their yeare's full race had runne,
Our fatal foe Canute king Swannus sonne,
To wretched England made returne againe
From Denmarke shores with many a thousand Dane,

15.
Who taking land at Sandwich in their ire,
Denoid of pitie in the spoile of good,
Senselesse of humane woes with spoilefull fire
All things did burne, that in their passage stood,
Nor yet suffic'd: but thirsting after blood,
All doom'd to death, none kept for captiue bands,
Were slaine in troopes by their remorselesse hands.

T'oppose their powers in field I soone did cite
My father's subjectes from all quarters by:
But when prepar'd we were in field to fight,
Th'unhappie tidings through our host did flie
Of false duke Edrick and his treacherie,
Who with his troope in depth of darkest night,
Vnto Canutus campe did take his flight.

17.
Whereby made weake vnable to withstand
Th'augmented powers of our insulting foe,
We backe return'd with our disabled band,
And to our kingly father we did show
Duke Edrick's treason, which, alas; with woe
So wounds his heart, that he expires his breath,
Poore aged king, and ends his woes in death.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

18.
He being dead, to me his eldest born,
Was left the relics of a ruin'd state,
By rage of Mars a kingdom rent and torn,
A diademe by stern decree of fate
Ordain'd for prize of bloody warre's debate,
Which was the end, for which Canute and I
In martial field did many a battell trie.

19.
O wretched end of glory thirsting pride!
O vain pursuit of empire and renowne!
What lot the land of discord doth betide
But wastfull spoile and all turn'd topsie downe?
What doe we purchase but a carefull crowne?
A crowne of care, the cause of froward strife,
The cause for which I lost my loued life.

20.
For after that against th'inundating foe
Six bloody battailes I had fought in field,
I that in warre away did victor goe,
On whom (O England) thou thy hopes didst build,
Vanquish't in peace to death was forc'd to yeeld:
The chance of warre my chance could not apall,
But trust in traytors wrought my wretched fall.

When as the crowne my head did first adorne,
These thoughts vnto my selfe, I thus did frame:
Vnto my selfe I am not onlie borne,
My countrie deare the cheefest part doth claime,
Who to my care now kneesles and craues the same,
To save the remnant of her ruin'd soile
From cruell foes that threat her vter spoile.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

22.

The thought of this did spirit bold inspire,
And smart of wounds receiu’d from foes of late
Did with swift furie feather my desire,
Which of itself by nature’s gifts did hate
To linger time, deferring utmost fate
   In doubtfull chance of battle to be tride,
   For which I was surnam’d, hight Ironside.

This fire of expedition in affaires
And height of resolution t’vndergoe,
Compar’d to strength of limbes and restlesse cares,
Redoubled in my thoughts t’oppugne the foe,
And yeeld releefe to England in her woe,
   Did touch Canusus hart with feare, though bent
   To trie his fortunes in the warre’s event.

Distracted thus with doubt, in any place
By doubtfull fight t’ingage his hopefull fate,
False Edrick hoping for to purchase grace,
Who for his treason to my sire of late,
Had run in danger of my deadly hate,
   Did plot the downfall of mine emperie,
   And in the end did act my tragedie.

From prince Canusus campe in dead of night,
Like the Greckes subtile Synon, to effect
His wicked plot, to vs he tooke his flight,
And at our feete himselfe he did proiect,
And spake, as if his thoughts had no respect
   To his owne life: for he with craftie wife
   Of seeming sorrow thus did me beguile.
"O noble prince," quoth he, "loe, I am come
As guilte to my selfe, and do require
To suffer shamefull death by righteous doome
From thine owne mouth, against whose royall sire
And gainst thy selfe I did of late conspire:
  Pronounce then death, a doome more sweet to mee,
Then aged dayes in loathed life can bee.

Ay me the dayes, on you I may exclaime,
In which to soule defame my life I lent:
Alas, the nights, that testifie my shame,
Your secret treasons I too late repent:
O wrongfull world, that made my thoughts consent:
  Nor dayes, nor nights, nor world in future time,
But will for aye record my gracelesse crime.

In vaine mine eyes, that shame yee do lament,
Which follows me where euer I doe wone,
In vaine my sighs, in vaine yee now are sent
From wofull hart to waile my trespass done:
For should I liue, foule shame how shall I shun?
  Then welcome death, 'tis death must end my woe,
Into my graue my greefe with me will goe."

This said, he wept and I began relent
And take remorse on his calamitie,
His hoarie head did moue me to lament
His wretched state, whom I from miserie
Restor'd againe to former dignitie:
  For I, whose thoughts were double dealing knew,
Did also thinke his thoughts vunst and true.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

30.
He being restor’d againe to liue in grace,
Did cloake beneath the vaile of loyaltie,
Th’intent of treason and did maske the face
Of soule deceit with fawning flattery,
Till time-borne truth did shew his treacherie,
For many a field and many a dreadfull fight
His treason shew’d, which time did bring to light.

31.
The scourge of peacefull pride, the god of warre,
The prodigie spender of sweet plentiful’s store
Did ride about our coast in iron carre,
Whose thundring wheeles like Neptune’s dreaded rore,
Were heard to rattle on our Albion shore,
So long, vntill the pale-fac’d queene of night
Had twelve times borrow’d of her brother’s light.

32.
In six fierce battels fought in martiall field,
Fortune my sword with conquest did renowne,
Six times Canute ore-match’d in fight did yeeld
And fled away, by froward fate cast downe,
Leaving to me the hope of England’s crowne:
Whose hopes my sword had smothered in the dust,
If I to traytor’s words had given no trust.

33.
For, after that I had with soule affright
Dispers’d the bold Canute mightie host,
That had begirt my loyall London hight,
Lest any breathing space might have been lost,
I follow’d him vnto that rockie coast,
Ouer whose mountaine tops the daie’s great guide,
The golden sunne appeares each morning tide.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

34.
And there where Medway with his siluer streames
Runs gliding downe the lowlie dales of Kent,
Vntill he meetes his elder brother Thames,
Vpon a hill I pight my warlike tent,
Expecting how the foes, that night stood bent,
If till the morne they did determine stay,
Or daunted with late foile would flie away.

35.
The night we past in quiet sleepe's repose,
And when the bright-cheekt ladie of the light
Tir'd with night's toyle from Tython's bed arose,
And in her saffron-coloured robe bedight
With her approch brought vse to mortall fight,
We troopt our men in Mars' his best array,
Vpon the foes in field to glie th'assay.

36.
The foes stood firme vpon the sandie ground,
Shaking their deadly darts with countnance proud:
Then did the trump the song of battaile sound,
And Danish kettle drums did beate alowd,
While euerie one in midst of martiall crowd
Instatiate in revenge vnndaunted stood,
Imbruing their bold hands in humane blood.

37.
While thus oppos'd both parts in fight did stand,
Hopefull of conquest, on the right side wing
Of all the host, nere to the slimie strand,
Where the sweet herbes by Medwaie's streames do spring,
The cries of wounded soouldiers high did ring,
For there Canute did charge with violent way
Of his horse troopes, in hope to win the day.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

38.
But to represse the fire and quench the flame
Of his hot courage, with a troope of horse
I rush't amongst his men with loud exclame,
Whom with fierce furie in our winged course
We did so charge, that we did soone inforce
Their faint retire, which we did swift pursue,
Vntill with open flight from field they flew.

39.
Then were the Kentish vales imbru'd in blood,
Then death was set on foote and thousands fell,
The brackish waues of Medganara's flood
With slaughtered bodies 'boue the bankes did swell,
Whose blushing streames the sight far of did tell
Painting the bankes with crimson in the way,
As they did glide into the Ocean sea.

40.
Here heauen did smile on me with gracious looke,
And fortune put faire conquest in my hand,
On bald occasion hold I might haue tooke
And thence-forth freed the subjects of my land
From scruple yoke of forraine king's command:
But what we purpose heauen doth still decree,
In vaine we wish what heauen wils not to bee.

The treacherous duke, the faithlesse man at armes,
Ignoble Edrick thus did counsell mee:
"My liege," quothe he, "we hazard now more harms
In pursuit of the flying enemie,
Then earst we did before the victorie,
'Tis best we sound retreate and fall to spoile,
Of these dead foes vpon the sandie soile.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

42.

Your men, though bold, yet wearied with the fight,
Be faint, and fortune may the foes so grace,
That they, constrain'd with desperate fear from flight
To backward death again to turne their face,
May charge our troops disordered in the chase:

Distraction heartens fear in desperate deeds,
Constraint in coward thoughts rash valor breeds."

43.

This did he speake despairing hope to come
For prince Canute, if we pursu'd the chase:
Some did approve his counsell sound, and some
Did urge against the same, yet found it grace
With those both rightlie wise and best in place:

By whose advice retreat I did command,
Losing the chance then put into my hand.

Thus did Troye's helm-deckt, Hector when in chase
He had the Greekes vpon Scamander's plaine,
And made them house their heads with deepe disgrace
In their owne fleet: whom then hee could haue slaine
And burnt their ships, which did their hopes containes:

But then being crost by lucklesse destinie
He did omit the profferd victorie.

45.

Thus did Rome's scourge, the famous Hanniball,
For when he might with his victorious powers
Haued made that towne beneath his sword to fall,
And leueld with the ground her high topt towers,
Then did he let passe those auspicious hures,

In which with ease he might haue queld the foe,
Who after wrought his and his countrie's woe.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

46.
Securefull thoughts do foster fond delay,
Bewitching hopes breed carelessnesse of minde,
Occasion set on wing flies fast away,
Whose backe once turn'd no hold fast can we finde,
Her feet are swift, bald is her head behinde,
Who so hath hold and after lets her goe,
Doth lose the lot which fortune did bestowe.

47.
Euen as a fire supprest, if yet remaine
A sparke not quite extinct, whence growes a flame,
Wil soone resume his former strength againe:
Euen so Canutus power, which I did tame,
And with one blow might then haue quelled the same,
Resum'd proud strength, which little time did yeeld,
And oft times after brau'd me in the field.

The bainfull'st battaile we did euer fight,
At Scourtan was, in fruitfull Worstershrie,
Where vnto both the hosts in open sight
Duke Edrick's treason plainly did appeare,
Which in his hart 'gainst me he still did beare:
The heart once tainted with foule treason's staine,
Posset with guile, scelome proues true againe.

49.
Two dayes in field we stood in doubtfull fight,
And after mutuall wounds with equall fate,
Both parts were parted by approching night:
But in the next daye's fight this traytor's hate
Did shew it selfe, for seeing the foes in state
Of strength declin'd, he sought by treacherie
To iue the day vnto the enemie.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

50.
In midst of martiall throng my folk t'excite,
As I did stand in skirmish 'gainst the foe,
A man of armes there was, which Osmeare hight,
So like to mee, that scarce you could him know,
By whom this traytor sought to worke vs woe:
   For as in fight he stood without all dread,
   False Edrick vndiscern'd did strike him dead.

51.
Whose liuelesse limbs in endlessse sleepe fast bound,
After he had despoil'd and headlesse made,
He tooke himselfe vnto an higher ground,
And piching Osmeare's head vpon his blade,
He held the same on high and thus he said:
   "Flie, wretched countrimen, your king is dead,
   The day is lost, see here king Edmund's head."

52.
The suddaine horror of this vncouth sight
With suddaine fright my folke did so dismay,
That they which were not in that part of fight
Where with my launce and sword I did display
Th'extreamest of my strength to win the day,
   Away had fled and lost the victorie,
   Had I not heard of Edrick's treacherie.

53.
With speed on top of an adjoyning hill,
My selfe I did conuey, where I in sight
Of all my host thus spake with voice most shrill:
   "Fellowes in armes," quoth I, "let not this slight
Of traytor's practise your bold thoughts affright:
   Behold yet free from death's captuittie,
   I liue to be reueng'd on th'enimie."
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

54.
This said, each one which had begun to flie
Turn'd head againe, and stoutly kept his place,
Then rushing with exclamies on th'enemie,
Eager with furie of their late disgrace,
They gaue the charge so fiercely on the face
   Of th'aduere force, that by their violent might,
   They brake the rankes, and turn'd their foes to flight.

55.
With whom the Mercian duke fled fast away,
The traytor Edrick hopelesse now of grace,
Who wing'd with feare of his decreed decay,
Outstript our pursuit, yet with greedie chace
We did pursue, vntill the day gaue place
   T'approching night, whose wished presence gaue
   Time to the foes themselves from death to saue.

56.
Canute being fled, did slacke no breathing space,
Once more to trie the chance of doubtfull fight:
But gathered his dispersed powers space,
With whom I by a place, which Dearehurst hight,
In sea-side bordering Glostershire should fight,
   Where I with resolution did intend
   In single fight this spoilefull warre to end.

57.
When on the fashie Seuerne's bordering costs
Oppos'd for fight, the battels ranged were,
A noble knight confronting both the hosts,
Did boldly in the midst advaunce his speare,
At which both armies did from fight forbeare,
   For straight my men I staid, because I knew
   His purpose then, which thus he did pursue.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

58.
"Ye glory-thirsting sonnes of Mars," said he,
"To what I speake, with good advice giue eare,
Let not my words by you contempted be,
If any love to humane good ye beare,
Ye will esteeme my exhortations deare,
    If either part my counsell shall refuse,
No good can happen in these warres we use.

59.
Not th'haplesse fate, which followes hostile warre:
Nor terrible events of bloody fight,
Nor spoiles, that spring from contumelious irre,
Nor woes produc'd from strife for lordly right,
To you, my countrimen, need I recite,
    For woe, alas, this land can testify
The raunous rage of Mars his tyrannie.

60.
Pitie the teares of this our mother Ile,
Whose fame which 'bout the world once shone as bright
As Phoebus shine, now dim'd, alas, the while,
With clouds of carefull strife hath lost her light,
That to behold her in this wretched plight,
    Like sorowe's image drown'd in wanes of woe,
Would make the hardest flint with tears to flow.

61.
Her fertile wombe, which goodly fruit did beare,
Now barren made, war's stormie breath hath blasted,
Her buds of gysome youth, which whilome were
The flowers of chivalrie, haue headlong hasted
Their timelesse end, while she in woe hath wasted,
    And we the cause, we wretches, that delight
By wicked warre to worke her more despight.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

62.
O noble princes, let not warre's blacke hand
Put out for aye the shine of England's light,
About whose right, both in contention stand,
But combate for it in a single fight,
And he that conquers, his be it by right:
Faire conquest's gift is in the hand of heav'n,
Which unto truth, for truth's own sake is giuen."

63.
He hauing said, forthwith I forth did step,
And cast my brazen gauntlet on the plaine,
To which Canute with courage bold did lep
And tooke it vp, casting in deepe disdaine
His rich grau'd gauntlet on the ground againe,
Which I accepted and propos'd the day,
When we in fight each other should assay.

64.
For battell was design'd a plot of ground
Within a little ile, which Olney hight,
Whom Scuerne with his armes incircleth round,
Where we as combatants in single fight
Should d'araine bettell in both armie's sight,
While they assigned were by our command,
Ou th'other side of Scuern's streame to stand.

65.
The day of fight being come and order giuen,
Through either host to euery seuerall band
To keepe their stand, my souldiers vp to heav'n
Did cast their eyes, beseeching loure to stand
By me in fight, and grace my powerfull hand
With conquest 'gainst Canute, by whom cast downe,
They did expect the rise of my renoune.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

66.
As they thus pra'ed, I arm'd me for the fight,
And being mounted on a sprightfull steed,
When 'twixt both armies I appear'd in sight,
My terrible aspect did terror breed
Vnto the aduerse part, but hope did feed
   My souldier's sight to see my goodly grace,
   My stout demeanor, and my stately pace.

67.
As Priam's Hector on the barren plaine,
Manag'd his horse before the walles of Troy,
When he in single battell did maintaine
Troye's right 'gainst Telamon, who did impoy
All his best strength bold Hector to destroy,
   So on my steed I trotted to and fro,
   Waiting th'approch of my expected foe.

Who came at length all arm'd in seemely wise
Into the lists, and when the trumpe did sound,
Our steeds as swift as birds of wings in skies,
Their course did run, and we with speares sharpe ground
Did fiercely meete each other to confound,
   In which swift course our shattered speares did flie,
   Like feathers borne by winde into the skie.

69.
As two fierce bulls fights twixt an heard of kine,
Whose violence doth increase, when in their sight
The crimson blood doth from their wounds decline,
So wounds giuen equally in doubtfull fight,
Our eager thoughts did to reuenge excite,
   The anguish arm'd our armes with strength to strike,
   And made vs both encounter lion-like.

VOL. II. 4 H
On horseback first the fight we did maintaine,
And when our horse did faile, dismounting straight
On foote the fight we did begin againe,
In which my foes haut courage gan to abate,
I with my sword laid on such wounds of weight,
That his faint knees did stoope at euerie blow,
And in the fight did stagger to and fro.

Who tir'd with toile and fearing least my sword
Should beare away the palme of victorie,
Thus spake to me: "Forbeare," quoth he, "braue lord,
This doubtfull fight, and let vs both agree
To ioyne our harts and hands in amitie,
Least that our swords each other do destroy,
Leaving this land for others to inioy.

Right well thou knowst the chance of victorie
Vncertaine is, and though the crowne thou claime
As due to thee and thy posteritie,
So, noble prince, I, in my father's name,
As my inheritance do craue the same:
In one consent then let vs both agree
That England's bounds twixt vs may parted bee.

Let not the inward hands of dogged hate
Teare thy great minde, but supple it with grace
Of heauenlie loue, let loue end our debate,
Which if in thought thou trulie canst imbrace,
Then in my hart thou hast a brother's place,
To which all-seeing Ioue I witnesse call,
Who is the suprême souereigne of vs all."
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

74.
To this I pause a while, but at the length
Conceiving well the combat's doubtful chance,
"Canute," said I, "since God hath given thee strength
In sight to trie the manage of my lance
And slaughter ing sword without thy life's mischance,
I think right well his will likewise it bee,
That in my kingdom thou haue part with me."

75.
This said, our swords we sheath'd in th'armie's sight,
And with kinde armes each other did embrace,
Hap'py it seem'd to those, that did delight
In hap'py peace, to see such love take place
Twixt two such mortall foes in so short space:
But hap'lesse I that did accord thereto,
Th'event whereof did breed my after woe.

76.
The traitor Edrick, preordaine by fate
To act my fall, whom for his treacherie
I daylie did pursue with deadlie hate,
Did instigate his sonne by villanie
With impious hands to act my tragedie,
Who to impietie by nature free,
After this tragick sort did murther mee.

77.
Upon a time, when in the Muse's bower,
England's Parnassus, famous Oxford hight
Was my abode, there in that fatall houre,
When as expedient vue did me excite
To do the deed of nature requisite,
Unto the draught as was my wont I went
Unto my nature's vue to yeeld content.
Edmund, surnamed Ironside.

78.
Where loe, the sonne of this false duke did lie
Hid in the vault, to further his intent
With weapon arm'd: for on the draught while I
Secure did sit, with fatal instrument
This villane gor'd my bodie's fundament,
And there to death his due I timelesse gane,
At Glastenburie I was laid in graue.

79.
Thus after twice sixe months, and as much space,
As from the time the swallow leaues her nest,
Till Phoebus haue the lion in full chase,
With th'angrie dog, that from his burning brest
Breaths mortall plagues, hot feauers and vnrest,
When I had raign'd, I lost my life and crowne:
With which our English name lost her renowne.

80.
Thus hast thou heard the sad catastrope,
And fatall period of my life and raigne,
In which thou seest, that where false treacherie
Hath touched the heart with her foule finger's staine,
There seldome constant truth returns againe,
Which that it may to future times be knowne,
Forget not what was said, when I am gone.
THE LAMENTABLE LIFE
and death of Prince Alfred, brother to King Edmund Ironside,

THE ARGUMENT.

"By death of this braue prince," quoth Memorie,
"The English lost both fame and libertie,
Too cruell were inexorable fates,
On him so swiftly t'execute their haotes:
Yet with his brother Alfred's wofull end
For tragicke act, his death may not contend,
Who liues an exile all his infancie
With his deare vnkle, duke of Normandie,
Whence he in riper yeares recall'd againe,
Returning is betray'd, and on the plaine
By Guilford towne his friends betray'd by night,
Are tith'd to death by Godwin, that false knight,
The prince is sent to Elie, where his eyne
Being both put out, with hunger he doth pine,
Till th'instruments of Harrold's tyrannie
Do butcher him with barbarous crueltie,
Who is the next in course, that must commend
To thee, the maner of his wofull end:
Let fame then call his mournefull ghost to tell
The woes and vncoth death, which him befell."
Alfred.

ANOTHER ARGUMENT.

Prince Alfred summon'd, tells to Memorie
His life, his death, and Godwin's treacherie.

Of all the sonses of men, unhappie fate
With spight pursues the borne of high degree,
Where tyrant wrong usurps the chaire of state
The baser subject sits from danger free,
Wofull it is of royall birth to bee,
    Of which my woes a witnesse may remaine,
    Such tragick woes no prince did ere sustaine.

Vp then (thou saddest of the sacred nine)
Cause of sad sorrow, never hast thou more,
Vp (rufull ghosts and shew some dolefull signe
Of heauie grieue) powre out your teares in store,
Cause of sad sorrow neuer had yee more:
    And (thou) the pen-man of my historie
Prepare sad verse for my sad tragedie.
Alfred.

3.
I am that Alfred, famous Edmund's brother,
Who in the time of my minoritie
Was by queene Emma our beloued mother,
Sent to mine vnclle duke of Normandie,
There to remaine safe from the enemie,
   While heere at home against the sonne of Swaine,
   My brother Edmund battell did maintaine.

Who being slaine, as thou before didst heare,
By treacherous Edricke and his bloodie sonne,
They for their fact a guerdon due did beare:
For whereas praise by it they thought t'haue wonne
Of king Canute, they both to death were done,
   Whose hands with blood, whose hearts with treason floe,
   Seldome in peace vnto the graue do goe.

Canute being set on the English throne
By ioynt consent of the nobilitie,
To sit sole monarch in the same alone,
Did daily seeke by wisdome's policie,
T'establish it to his posteritie,
   While I, and Edward hight my elder brother,
   Did liue in exile with our wofull mother.

Meane time Canute, th'vsurper of our right,
Hug'd in the armes of peace, and finding none
That could oppose themselves against his might,
After all stormes of warre were ouerblowne,
By blood gan tyrant-like t'vsurpe the throne :
   For without cause the royall blood he spilt
   Of Edmund's brother Edwin, void of guilt.
7.
King Edmund's sonnes, those faultlesse infants twaine,
Edmund and Edward by his sterne decree,
Were sent vnto the Norway king hight Swaine,
He being design'd to act their death: but hee
Lamenting their mishaps, did set them free,
And sent them both vnto th'Hungarian king,
Who kept them safe beneath his soueraigne wing.

Canute being freed from doubtfull feare of those,
That to the diademe might make iust claime,
To peacefull pleasure did his thoughts diaposie,
And gan to thinke how with some royall dame,
He in chast bed might amplifie his name,
No sonne he had t'enjoy this wretched soile,
But Harrold basely borne of beautie's spoile.

Vpon our mother he did cast his loue,
On whose dislike of loue we both did build
Our future hopes, but she, alas, to proue
The weakenesse of her sexe, as prompt to yeeld,
Leauing vs both, whom she from harme should sheeld,
Did cast her wauering thoughts vpon Canute,
And in the end did grant his vniust suit.

10.
(O) who doth know the wandring eye, that feeds
Th'vnstedfast fancie of weake women's heart,
Constant in nought, but in inconstant deeds,
In weaknesse strong, as if the soule's best part
Composed were by fond loue's artlesse art:
Alas, that faithlesse faults shouldso excell,
Where faultlesse faith with reason ought todwell.
Alfred.

11.
She bath'd in blisse, while we lay drown'd in woe,
She grew in pride, while we did pine away,
She soft embrac'd in th'armes of our false foe,
Did smile at our mishaps, while day by day
We did expect our louse liues decay:
For fatail 'tis to princes royall borne
Where tyrant's browses the garland doth adorne.

12.
So long with her Comute she liu'd in loue,
Till with loue's fruit her wombe to wex begun,
Which being brought to light, a sonne did proue:
But when that twice nine times the golden sun
In heauen's bright zodiack through the signes had run,
The clouds of care began the dolefull night,
Which did eclipse the shine of her delight.

Then the deare daies of her dread lord were done,
The stroke of death no mortall may withstand,
The kingdome Harrold his ignoble sonne,
The bastard did aspire, by whose command
Our wretched mother was exil'd the land,
And in despight despoil'd of all that store,
Which her Comute had giuen to her before.

14.
But death's cold touch so soone did close mine eies,
That I beheld not my sad mother's woes,
The base vaurper did my death Denise
Before her fall, in court soone finding those,
Whom he to act my tragicke murther chose:
The courts of kings with sycopants do swarwe,
Tyrants do want no instruments of harme.

VOL. II.
Alfred.

15.

An English earle there was, which Godwin hight,
Whose name about the world report did blaze,
A man of wicked wit, in fortune's sight
So highly grac'd, that he himselfe did raise
To be the greatest peer in those our daies,
   The king was only then a king by name,
   While he perform'd the office of the same.

16.

And in the ruffe of his felicitie,
Prickt with ambition, he began disdain
His bastard lord's usurp'd authority,
Plotting by private counsels, how to gaine
Th'emperiall garland after him to raigne:
   Greatness in sway of state gives wings t'aspire,
   Advancement feeds ambition with desire.

17.

In broken sleepes he did consume the night,
While his liege lord lay lull'd in th'armes of shame,
Hope of a kingdome was his sole delight,
While Harrold senselesse of all kingly fame,
To idle ease himselfe did only frame,
   Which set th' insulting Godwin's hopes on wing,
   Whence woe is me, my woes did after spring.

My brother and my selfe, alas, the while,
Vnto his hopes to make the passage free,
Were markt for death, nor could our sad exile
Suffice hard fate, my wofull tragedie
Must be the subject of his treacherie,
   We were the objects of proud Godwin's crowne,
   We only stood betwixt him and the crowne.
Alfred.

19.
T'effect his purpose, he did soone excite
The tyrant king, whose actions he did sway,
To thinke, that while mine eyes beheld heau'n's light,
He liu'd in reach of danger day by day,
His safetie liu'd vpon my liue's decay:
   For I, he said, being of an haughtie spirit,
   Would seeke by might my father's right t'inherit.

The bastard king to bloodie deeds inclin'd,
To rob me of my life stood fully bent:
Letters forthwith by messengers design'd,
Forged by wicked wits for their intent,
In our queene mother's name to me were sent,
   Which I accepted as vnfain'd and true,
   The tenor of the which doth heere ensue.

21.
"Emma, but only England's queene in name,
Edward and Alfred, her two sonnes doth greet
From England's chiefest peeres, who do reclaime
You both from exile, and do thinke it meet,
That you in Normandie should rigge some fleet,
   And crosse the seas your father's right to claime,
   They all will be assistant in the same.

22.
Strike the hard steele, while yet the fire is in,
Slip not occasion put into your hand,
The tyrant Hurrold daily seokes to win
The peeres vnto his aid, who yet will stand
In your defence, and hazard life and land:
   Then come with speed, for warre we will prepare,
   The way is plaine, the time doth proffer faire."
Alfred.

23.

This in effect their letters testify,
Which did my forward thoughts so much excite,
That though my brother then in Hungarie
Were absent farre, yet to obtaine our right,
I tooke the seas with many a Norman knight:
   But cursed be that voyage euermoe
   Whose end did end my life with bitter woe.

24.

Woe worth the ground, where grew the towring mast,
Whose sailes did beare vs through the water's røre,
Woe worth the winde, that blew the banefull blast,
Woe worth the waue, whose surge so swiftlie bore
My tragick barke to England's fatall shore,
   Woe worth the mast, the sailes, winde, waues and all,
   That causelesse did conspire poore Alfredc's fall.

Why were not they by cruell fates assign'd
To gieue that due to death? which death did craue,
On ragged rockes, O why did I not finde
A milder death? why was the darksome waue
Upon my way not made my bodie's graue?
   Ah why, why did they let my forward feete
   Once touch the shore, such cruell death to meete?

26.

After our ships had brought vs to the shore
And giuen vs vp as captiues to the land,
At Guilford downe, a place so call'd of yore,
A fatall place to me, did Godwin stand
To entertaine me and my Norman band,
   Who with the shew of true fidelitie
   Did maske the face of his false treacherie.
Alfred.

27.

He did imbrace me round with treason's armes,
And sawnd upon me with a villain's smile,
His lookes were blith to hide his purposes harmes,
His words, which graced were with sugred stile,
Made musike in mine eares, and to beguile
Suspition's self a solemn vow he made
Against all aduerse power my part to aide.

28.

At Guilford he gaue counsell as a friend
To make abode with all my companie,
For there hee said my favorites did intend
To meete me with their powers, who would applie
Their best indevoures 'gainst mine enemie:
In which being confident, with ioynt consent
Of all my friends, I vnto Guilford went.

29.

There did the chorus to proud Godwin's play
First tell the sequele of my miserie,
There first appear'd the plot of my decay,
There the sad scene of my black tragedie
Was first begun by Godwin's treacherie,
And there my friends took hands in death and led
The tragick daunce, which I did after tred.

30.

When vnto Guilford with my troope I came,
Godwin of purpose did augment our traine,
And for one place could not containe the same,
Lodging in diuers Ins he did ordaine,
Which might twice tenne or thirtie men containe,
Which he before with Harrold did devise,
The better to effect his enterprise.
Alfred.

31.

Plentie, the childe of peace, in euerie house
Did furnish out the tables with her store,

Lycaus fruitfull cup with full carouse
Went round about, mirth stood at euerie doore,

The olue branch deceitfull treason bore,

Vsing the voice of peace which sweet did sound,

To vs at feast that were, in solace drown'd.

32.

The greedie gorge repleat with plentious feast,
Besots the sense and duls the spiritfull minde,

Th'infeced braine with strength of wine opprest,
Losing all quick conceit, soone waxed blinde,

The depth of Godwin's plots we could not finde:

Deceit workes surest, where the wit before

Hath weakened been by plentie's feastfull store.

33.

This fatall banquet, that did then forerun
The day that death put many soules to flight,

To soone did end, too soone the golden sunne
Fell to the ocean, and the dismal night

Came vp from seas to work my foule despight,

The woe which chearefull day before did hide

To end our cheare, the night too soone descrie.

34.

When in my naked bed my limbes were laid
And I enchain'd in deepest sleepe did lie,

The rufull clamors of my friends betray'd
Did ring about mine eares: with whose sad crie

I rose from sleepe, and from my bed did flie:

But by the armed men and doores fast made,

My weapons gone, I knew I was betraild.
Alfred.

35.
Then did I looke, when death would at the doore
Come in, to sease my life with violent hand:
My chamber shooke, my hart gan tremble sore,
And as in horror I did silent stand,
Vp flew the doores, in rush't an armed band,
Who laid rude hands on me in spightfull hate,
Without respect vnto my princelic state.

But when Aurora left her Tython's bed,
And through each part of heau'n disperst her light,
My Norman friends fast bound in bands were led
To Guilford downe, to whom in dolefull plight
None gaue releefe, false Godwin tooke delight
With sight of their sad death his eyes to feed:
Such sight would cause the hardest hart to bleed.

37.
By casting lots they were ordain'd for death:
Of ten, still nine did beare the bitter fate,
And in strange torture did expire their breath:
The tenth reseru'd did liue in wretched state
Of bondage, till the day of finall date:
And thus six hundred vnto death being done,
All faithfull friends did my sad fall forerun.

My friends thus slain, through couert shades of night,
That none to my abode might priuie be,
Conuey'd I was to th'ile of Elie hight,
There to abide, till Harrold did decree,
What kinde of death from thrall should set me free:
Where I with care consum'd for death did call
Vntill a fate far worse then death did fall.
Then cause thy muse with me to mourne her fill,
And all yee nightlie birds, that do appeare,
As gaste ly signes, shrike out your deadlie ill,
Let all that wofull is and voide of cheere,
That may augment my dole, to me draw neere,
And helpe me with their vncothie companie
To tune the song of my sad tragedie.

Despoil’d by foes of all my princelie state,
And lockt in dungeon deepe from sight of heauen,
Sweete dame delight, with whom I liu’d of late,
Farre from my sad abode away was driuen,
And carefull sorrow for companion giuen:
The youthfull spring of my delight was done,
And winter’s state now in my youth begun.

And with the winter of my woes begun
The frostie seasons winter bore apart,
Whose vnkinde cold did through my bodie run,
While gnawing hunger to increase my smart,
For want of foode did feed vpon my hart:
Thus I with cold and hunger long foreworne,
Did nought but mourning pine and pining mourne.

My greene of youth with griefe’s sad sighes was blasted,
The sap of my life blood began decay,
My flesh through fast and euill fare was wasted,
My hart did faint, my strength did fleete awaie:
Ah God that death oft wisht so long did stay,
Why did not fates prevent my bloodie foes,
And with keene knife in death cut of my woes?
Alfred.

43.

My woes, alas, as yet were to begin:
For though my foes were priuie to my cries,
Yet could my rufull plaints no pitie winne,
To take from me at length they did desuise,
The last of all my comforts, both mine eyes:
   Ah cruel foes, too cruel were ye bent,
   Why could my death to you not yeeld content?

44.

When first the instruments of Harrold’s ire
Did come prepar’d to rob me of my sight,
Hoping that death, which I did long desire,
Had then been sent to me, the last despiught
That can be done to man in wretched plight:
   These words I spake to moue remorse of mind,
   While teares in plentie downe my cheeks declin’d.

45.

“Thrice happie men, if ye the tidings bring’
Of happie death my dolefull daies to end,
From whose long houres my lasting death doth spring,
This last request to you I do commend,
That pitying my sad plaints, you may befriend
   My wretched soule with quicke dispatch in death,
   And not with torture, when I yeeld my breath.

46.

Behold this bodie pin’d away with woe,
This starued carcasses in such rufull plught,
That who, alas, can poore prince Alfred know,
These checkes, whilome so full of fresh delight,
Now wexed pale and wan, are dri’d vp quite
   For want of dew: yet dew’d with sad supplies
Of mournfull teares still flowing from mine eies.

VOL. II.

4 K
Yeeld then, O yeeld some comfort in this case,
And do not yee augment my deadly smart,
Ilke hug sweet death, and with kind armes embrace
His grisly shape, and woe him with his dart
To end my woes, by wounding my poore heart:
Only make ye dispatch when ye begin,
And heau'ns impute it not to you for sin."

This did I speake, supposing they were come,
With violent hands to make my life the prize
Of wished death: but by more grieuous doome,
I first adivded was to lose mine cies:
For while that ynto heau'n with pitious cries
Upon their crueltie I did complaine,
They reft me of my sight with bitter paine.

Thenceforth, as caytife cast in dungeon deepe,
Where with fresh griefe my hart did hourely bleed,
As Philomel that spends her time of sleepe
In mournefull tunes recording his misdeed,
Whose lust in wastefull woods her shame did breede,
Night's endlesse houres till death did end the same,
Against my foes I wasted in exclame.

Famine, the childe of want did feast my soule,
And in my brest her hungrie arrow steepe,
The black night's shrieking bird, the ghastlie oule
With balefull notes in woeing woe did keepe
My greeued soule, when nature craued sleepe,
With whose shrill shreeks my plaints did beare a part,
And kept true time with sighes from sorrowing hart.
Alfred.

51.
Sorrow and griefe with waste of tears drawne drie,
Suppli'd the place where eyes did once remaine,
Whose want of tears my hart did still supplie
With drops of blood, fresh bleeding with the paine
Of wounding griefe which it did long sustaine,
Of which impatient to despaire being duien,
Cursing my birth, I thus did crie to heauen.

52.
Woe worth the wombe, which nature did inforce
To bring me forth and leave me in neglect:
Woe worth the starre, that did direct my course,
If anie starre the course of life direct:
Woe worth the hour, which did my birth detect:
Woe to you all, that did conspire with foes
To drowne my better dayes in bitter woes.

53.
Why do I liue? ah, why liue I the space,
Of half a day in this my mournefull mew?
Why doth grim death so often shew his face?
The woefull waste in me why doth he view
Of nature's worke: and yet not craue his due?
Why do I liue, yet daylie die with paine?
Why do I die, yet daylie live againe?

54.
To you therefore ye heau'ns, whose cheerefull face
With mortall eyes I never more shall see,
To you and all your powers I crie for grace:
Let me, ah let me now no longer be,
But by swift death from foes do set me free:
My dayes be ouer long, for death I crie,
End then my dayes (O God) and let me die.
Wanting the value of patience, wherewithall
To cure the sore of sorrow grown so wise
In my griev’d heart, thus forc’d I was to call
For death to launch the wound with his sharpe knife,
Which griefe had fester’d in my loathed life:
   Who in his horrid shape himselfe did shew
   To me poore wretch, with too much paine and woe.

For death at last with such vnkinde constraint
Did force my soule from th’house of her vnrest,
That never prince had cause of more complaint:
Nature’s vnkindest children will detest
My death’s vnkindnesse, and the flintest brest
   Will learn to expire sad sighs with sorrow’s breath,
   To heare me tell the manner of my death.

From thence, where in grim darknesse I did dwell,
I forth was fetch’d, and by my foes that been
First stript I was, and then (O woe to tell)
My wombe was opened with a rasor keene,
With paine of which downe sinking, I did weene
   That then my gasping ghost would haue expir’d
   The breath of life, which I so oft desir’d.

But after grievous groane, when as my sprite
With feeling sense resuied was againe,
My sterne tormentors, seeming to delite
In this their bloody game, while I in vaine
Did beg dispatch of my tormenting paine,
   With vnremorsefull hands againe began
   T’inflict more woes on me most woefull man.
Alfred.

59.
At that smart wound, which in my wombe they made,
One of my intractes ends they forth did take,
Which, out alas, (that ere it should be said
Of any prince) they fasten to a stake,
And with sharpe needles (yet my ghost doth quake
To thinke on it) my tender sides they wound
About the stake to make me go around.

60.
With painfull wounds they wound me in each part,
When still I stood to ease me of such woe,
Yet worse then painfull wounds increast my smart
As oft as I about the stake did go,
Then in this pitious plight, what should I do?
Death's touch I felt: yet by my foes made blind,
The readie way to death I could not find.

61.
At length my soule vnable to withstand
Th' afflictions of my foes, in heart made stout
With torment of my wounds, I have in hand
Went on with death that deadly stake about,
Vntill my bowels being winded out,
With death I fell, and in that fall did find
An end of woe, an end of griefe of mind.

Men light of credence warned be by me,
To deeme no profer'd friendship firme and sure:
Till truth have triall made, for flatterie
Makes fained loue the fittest cloake t'obscure
Falsehood from truth, which practise puts in vre,
Of which that henceforth I a Mirrour bee,
My storie told, I leaue it vnto thee.
THE TREACHEROVS

Life and infamous Death of Godwin,
Earle of Kent.

THE ARGUMENT.

"The baneful plot of Godwin's treacherie,
And Alfred's ruin end," quoth Memorie,
"With doubt may shake a weak believing mind,
Which to resolve, no better proofe I find
Then Godwin's selfe, who in his turne shall tell
After prince Alfred's death, what him befell,
How he in servise of Canute his king,
In forren warres himselfe in grace did bring,
How he in state did rise, with what increase
Of noble issue, heau'n his house did blesse,
His life produc'd to length of many yeares,
Four kings he serues, in Edward's daies appeares
His treason t'Alfred, till that time conceal'd,
Which by the hand of heau'n is then reuel'd,
His oath, his perjurie, bread stops his breath,
Heau'n plagues his issue for prince Alfred's death,
The truth of which, that we at large may heare,
Let fame's trumpe cause his guiltie ghost t'appare."
ANOTHER ARGUMENT.

Godwin as guiltie tels th'ambitious ayme
Of his desire, first cause of all his shame.

FAIRE fall the steps, that happily do end
Their course begun in vertue's painfull race,
Many begin that steepie hill t'ascend,
Where vertue dwels; but few do find such grace
As not to faint, ere they attaine that place,
To tread the path of praise I first begunne,
But lost true praise, which I did weene t'haue wonne.

Ambition tooke me by the haplesse hand,
And with delight led me another way,
Both blood and treason in my way did stand,
Which heau'n with vengeance failes not to repay,
Although reuenge of men escape they may:
Of which that I a Mirrour be, giue care,
And in thy mind my fatall storie beare.
Godwin.

3.
I am that Godwin, sometimes carle of Kent,
Who with king Harold did conspire to shed
Prince Alfred's blood, which I too late repent:
For whereas I upon the glorious bed
Of spotlesse honor, might have laid my bed,
This one blacke deed of my false treacherie,
Doth brand my name with spot of infamie.

If from that way, my steps had never strai'd,
Which in my youthfull daies I first did tread,
My famous acts, which now are all decai'd,
Had liu'd in lines of gold, and in the stead,
Of soule defame, with praise had crown'd my head:
But partiall fame lets passe our deeds of praise,
Our worser deed she keepes for future daies.

When bold Canulus, that victorious king,
O'er Danes and English did in triumph raigne,
Desire did set my youthfull thoughts on wing
In pursuit of renowne, which to attaine,
From pleasure's idle bed I did refraine:
Ease duls the sprite, each drop of fond delight
Allaiies the thirst, which glorie doth excite.

6.
About this time we being secure of warre,
Fame by report did giue to vnderstand,
That the bold Vandale threatened to inferre,
Such strong inuasion both by seas and land
Upon the Danes, that all the force of hand,
That they for warre could make, would scarce suffice
To giue repulse vnto their enemies.
Godwin.

7.
Which when Canute did heare, his Danish force
He mustred vp, and I inspir'd by fame,
Troopt vp my Kentish friends, both foot and horse,
With whom deckt in braue armes and skill'd in frame
Of varied fight, vnto Canute I came,
With whom to Denmarke I design'd did goe,
Conductor of the English 'gainst the foe.

8.
The seas we launcht, but long we had not wau'd,
Vpon the deepe, when all our ships did scatter,
Proud Nereus fom'd, the sea lookt blacke and rau'd,
The billowes rude rouz'd into hils of water,
Cuffe after cuffe the earth's greene bankes did batter,
Which with their force our scattered nauie bore
In great distresse about the Norway shore.

9.
Tost to and fro, the storme at length ore-blowen,
We did arriuue vpon the Danish coast,
Where, in the field the Vandale dreadlesse grown,
Their valours to auouch, did vaunt and boast
Of spoiles and captiues in their conquering host,
'Twixt whom and us the fight had then begun,
Had night, to part the fray, not twixt vs run.

10.
The night, that givs each deathlesse creature rest,
In chaines of darknesse all the earth did bind,
And in our tents, each one as seem'd him best,
Did passe the time: but in my labouring mind
Nor rest, nor sleepe could entertainment find,
Care kept me waking, how I best might bring
My selfe in credit with Canute the king.

VOL. II. 4 L
11.
The time, I thought, did fit occasion yeeld,
The foes with fond neglect of vs at shore
Did sleepe secure, dispread about the field,
Their guard slight kept, their men were wearied sore
With hunting after spoile the day before,
Whom to Canute vnknowne could we confound,
Our names I thought, would euer be renown'd.

12.
These thoughts, but newly borne in my great mind,
By secret messengers I did conuent,
The English chieftaines all, whom I did find
In heart so well inclin'd, that all were bent
With readie hands to strengthen my intent,
And in each point their minds to mine did frame
For this affaire, all thirsting after fame.

Our English quarter, which did vtoast lie,
We vndescri'd, drew forth, and on our way
With silence we did passe, the windes blew high,
And night her darksome wings did wide display,
Lest th'aduerse scout our purpose might bewray:
So forth we went, and gain'd with good event,
The drowsie Vandalie's vtoast regiment.

14.
The outward watch, and courts of guard being skaine,
Through all their rankes by slaughter making way,
We did at length their fatall tents attaine,
In which, as in neglect they sleeping lay,
Without respect all went the common way,
That leads to death, as well the noble kind
As the ignoble, were in death confin'd.
Godwin.

15.
Then was th'alarum giuen, and euery where
The foes with fearefull shotts did pierce the skie,
Heere one affrighted silent stands, and there
Another dreading death doth mercie crie,
Heere one cries stand, another there bids flie:
   In euery place death's terrour did abound,
   And all on heapes our foes we did confound.

At length, troopt vp in haste the foes made head,
Twixt whom and vs ensu'd a deadly flight,
Grim death in darknesse hid, did bring more dread
With his approch, the foes, through sable night,
Their friends from foes could not discerne aright,
   In which distresse vnable long to shield
   Their campe from spoile, they fled and left the field.

17.
Darknesse suborn'd their flight, and did preuent
Our purpos'd pursuit for th'intended chase,
Their campe laid waste, we found in euery tent
Rich spoile and captiues, men of no meane place,
With more renowne our deed of worth to grace,
   Of which Canute our king did nothing know,
   Vntill the morning's light our deeds did show.

18.
For when in east Aurora did appeare,
Canute intending to begin the fight,
When he of our supposed flight did heare,
In rage he vow'd reuenge for such despight,
And forth in furie marcht: but when in sight
   The Vandale's campe appeard despoil'd with fire,
   And all their host dispers'd, he gan admire.
Godwin.

19.
The Danes, in troopes all gathered, stood amaz’d
To see through what great dangers we had run,
Upon the slaughter’d Vandales wounds they gaz’d,
Upon the captiues and the rich spoiles wonne,
Applauding all with praise, what we had done,
   The king himselfe, in heaping praise on praise,
   The worth of this our deed on high did raise.

20.
The good successe of this high conquest won,
My name in credit with the Dane did bring:
And to encrease this honor new begun
In th’horrid warre betwixt the Norway king
And prince Canute, of which the world did ring,
   I by my deeds upon the Norway coast,
   Did saue Canutus and his fainting host.

21.
When Olauus and Vfse those brothers stout,
With their Norwegians in a dangerous fight,
Against Canute successfelly had fough’t,
I with my English sooldiers in his sight
Regain’d againe, what he had lost by flight,
   And forc’d proud Olauus to fle the field,
   Who to our king his crowne did after yeeld.

22.
Grac’d in all warre affaires without mischance,
With king Canute in such great grace I came,
That he, my name and fortunes to advaunce,
His sister gaue to me for wife, whose name
Hight Thira faire, a ladie of great fame,
   Whom I with earnest suite did often proue,
   And in the end obtain’d her for my loue.
Godwin.

23.
Thus with auspicious looke the heau'ns beheld,
The new borne infant of my towring state,
Which growing vp, with proud ambition swell'd,
Flattering it selfe with hope of happier fate,
Which to obtaine I long did lie in wait,
And left at length true honor's path to tred,
To trace the footing which ambition led.

24.
When death did end Canutus' life and raigne,
I standing in contention, t'whom the right
Of England's vnswai'd empire should remaine,
Canute's base sonne, ambitious Harrold hight,
Did step into the throne in my despight,
Being backt by diuers peeres, that sought to clime
By his support in this new change of time.

25.
'Gainst whom I stood with fained loyalty
To those two princes, sonnes of Egelred,
The true borne heires to England's emperie:
In which affaire, had fortune false not fled
And turn'd her backe, the crowne had grac'd my head:
For had I gain'd the garland in their name,
Neither of them should haue enjoy'd the same.

26.
But al-seeing heau'n, that did my drift perceive,
To take effect would not permit the same,
Those strong built holds I was constrain'd to leaue,
In which defiance I did first proclaime,
Against the bastard in prince Alfred's name:
Wherefore my oath I vnto Harrold past,
To be true liegeman, while my life did last.
Yet did not this my mounting thoughts beat downe,
Nor quell the pride of my aspiring mind,
My heart still aim'd at England's royall crowne,
Aspiring hope did th'eies of reason blind,
To all impiety I was inclin'd,
Of which prince Alfred, whom would I bad nener
Betray'd to death, a Mirror lies for euer.

The maner of whose death I shame to tell,
Such was the cruell torment of the same,
And such the noble vertues, that did dwell
In th'heart of that sweet prince, whose liuing name
To all posteritie records my shame,
The more his vertues were, whose blood I spilt,
Remorselesse wretch, the greater was my guilt.

Curtst be the gracelesse heart's vnawayed pride,
Which tempted me to act so foule a deed,
Why as at first did not faire vertue guide
My steps in path of praise? why in her steed,
All grace abolisht, did foule vice succeed?
With state and greatnesse, vertue seldom dwels,
State fosters pride, pride all good grace expels.

After the murder of this guiltlesse man,
Long time I flourisht with prosperitie,
In slothfull Harold's daies my house began
With many valiant sonnes to multiply,
Who after came to great authoritie,
Of whom hereafter I intend to tell,
Hearken meane while what vnto me befell.
Godwin.

31.

Hearken ye glory-thirsting men, and heare
Judgement of wreakful wrath powr'd downe by Ioue
On me, and on my house, that all may feare,
Aspiring honor's height those plots to proue,
To which vaine pride the heart doth often moue,
   Of which, both I, and all my progenerie,
   May Mirrors be to all posteritie.

32.

When Harrold had, the tearme of three yeares space,
Vpon the English throne borne supreme sway,
He dying left a name of soule disgrace,
T'obtain true fame, he never gane th'assay,
His idle life in sloth did fleete away:
   In hours of ease, who euer spends his daies
   To future time, leaues seldome any praise.

33.

Vpon the throne, his brother did succeed
Prince Hardiknute, Canute's lawfull sonne,
Whom I did feare, lest for my bloody deed
By his edict, I should to death be done,
Which I in lawfull triall could not shun,
To murdred Alfred he was borne halfe brother,
   Got by Canute on Emma his queene mother.

34.

Yet I being right expert in euery thing,
Which did pertaine to subtile policie,
Both tooke a solenne oth before the king,
That I from guilt of Alfred's blood was free,
With which his friends had often charged me:
   And also, that mine oth might fauour finde,
   With golden gifts I did corrupt his minde.
If that the powre of gold doe conquer kings,
Corrupts the noble, and deceaues the wise,
Subdues the valiant: yea, the brother brings
To sell his brother's blood for golden prize,
Wherewith to glut his greedie avarice:
   No maruell then, if that my gold did bring
   This fained oth in credit with the king.

Of Hardiknute this favoure I did finde,
I liu'd in grace and great felicitie,
To me the rule of all things hee resign'd,
He onely kept his kingly dignitie,
All things were swaid by my authoritie:
   But after two yeares space, by suddaine death
   In midst of mirth, he lost his vitall breath.

Being at a feast vpon a solemn day,
At Lambeth house, within the bishop's place,
With cup in hand his life did fleet away,
To ground he fell and did cold death imbrace,
Leaving fewe friends to waile his woefull case:
   In loue of drinke he liu'd, in drinke he dide:
   Such drunken death oft drunkards doe betide.

Prince Edward, Alfred's brother, he being dead,
Was left the lawfull heire vnto the crowne,
Which I did clame as due from Edgelred,
And on his seeming foes I seem'd to frowne,
That sought with violent hands to pluck him downe:
   For well I did perceau, he being king,
   To good effect my purpose I should bring
Thus did I sit in top of fortune's wheele,
Knit to the royall blood of England's crowne,
Till death did strike, mischance I nere did feele,
 Fortune at my successes did neuer frowne,
Who in the hight of pride pluckes manie downe:
  Dreadlesse I liu'd, being dreaded still of all,
  Fearing no lucklesse chance, that might befall.

Beneath the sway of my securefull power
I from the king my guilt did long conceale
Of Alfred's death, vntill that fatall houre,
When fate appointed did my soule appeale,
And in my death my bloodie deed reuеale:
  Blood for due vengeance never calls in vaine,
  Heaven will revenge, when we remisse remaine.

Once sitting at the table with the king,
My son, whose office was the cup to bear,
By chance did stumble, as he did it bring,
And lightlie did himself againe vpreare,
At which by me these speeches spoken were:
  " Ha, ha, my liege," said I, " see how one brother
  In time of need can well sustaine the other."

To which the king return'd this sterne replie
With browes contract, signes of his angrie minde,
" Most true it is," said he, " and so should I
My louing brother Alfred liuing finde
To helpe me now, but for thy self vnkinde."
  With which neere toucht: yet all distrust to shun,
  Bread streight I took, and thus my oth begun.
"This bread," quoth I, "I never wish to take
Downe through this throat into my hollow chest,
But choking me, God grant, that it may make
My death a scandal, to my soule vnblest,
Which heav'n henceforth for ever may detest,
If I your brother Alfred did betray,
Or gaine consent to take his life away."

No sooner had I spoke, and taken bread,
But of the heavens, my wish I did obtaine,
Vnto the ground I instantlie fell dead,
While yet the bread did in my throate remaine,
Through which to passe, the breath did strue in vaine:
In death did beau'n detect my villanie,
In death did vengeance justlie seise on mee.

Which in my suddaine downefall tooke not end,
This dreadful judgement could not satisfye
The wrath of righteous loue, who did intend
The extirpation of my progenie,
In the revenge of Alfred's tragicke,
With seu'n sonnes done to death, all valiant men,
My name did vade, as it had neuer ben.

My eldest sonne, hight Swaine, in his rash moode
With rage incen'st, with his vnhappy hand,
Did beast-like spill his uncle Byrons blood,
For which a pilgrim to the holie land
He was injoy'd by churche's strict command:
Where rouing Saracens vpon the way,
With murther did his vncele's death repay.
The next was Harrold, who in Edward's reigne,
After my death grew famous in this land,
Manie great victories he did obtaine
Against the Welsh, who with rebellious hand
Against the king themselves did proudlie band:
   For which in name and fame he was renown'd,
   And by the king with manie merits crown'd.

But the third brother did thereat enuie,
Tostie by name, a man of mickle pride,
Which when his brother Harrold did espie,
His angerie hart did swell, and rage did guide
That reason, which doth man and beast divide:
   For on a time inrag'd with anger's sting,
   They fell at ods in presence of the king.

Where Harrold caught young Tostie by the haire,
And with his fist did smite him on the face:
But by well-wishing friends they parted were:
Yet Tostie in his minde for such disgrace,
Did vowe revenge in more convenient place,
   And forthwith from the court with angerie looke,
   To Harrold's house his readie way he tooke.

Where when hee came, the servants hee did finde
Preparing all things for the king's repaire,
On whom he wreak'd the vengeance of his minde:
For not a man his wrathfull sword did spare,
In his revenge they all alike did share:
   Yet could not this his furie's heat asswage,
   Their limmes he hew'd in pieces in his rage.
Godwin.

56.
Which he amongst the hogsheads of pure wine,
Vessels of ale and cy达尔 did bestow,
And in the lomes of meath, and tubs of brine,
And other sorts of liquor he did throw
Heads, legs, and armes, whence yet warme blood did flow:
Then sent he word, that at his brother's house
The king should find good store of powdered sowce.

56.
For which offence, he was exilde the land,
And Harrold after Edward as his right
The crowne did claine, 'gainst whom no peere did stand:
Yet Tostie did the Norway king excite,
In bataille gainst his brother for to fight,
In which by Harrold vpon Stamford plaine,
Both Tostie and the Norway king were slaine.

57.
Stout Harrold in the field his death's wound tooke,
With his two brethern Girth and Leowin,
At Battaile abbey 'gainst the Norman duke:
For in ist judgement then did beau'n begin
To plague this land for my detested sinne,
Which from that time twice thirtie yeares and foure,
With Norman bondage was oppressed sore.

58.
Thus by decree of fate without remorse
By the keene sword five sonnes to death's doome past,
The sixt in riding on a head-strong horse
Into the siluer Thames dark deepe was cast,
In which his soule the pangs of death did taste:
The seventh and last was in close prison kept,
Vntill in death the conquering Norman slept.
Yet heere heau'ns heauie iudgement did not end,
My wretched mother, though forworne and old,
Vntimely fell, who, while she liu'd, did send
Yong dames to Denmarke, where for gaine of gold,
Their virgin beauties vnto lust were sold,
   For which offence, to all the world a wonder,
   She stricken was from heau'n by horrid thunder.

And that on earth, my shame might never die,
The sea's proud waues haue ouerrun my lands,
Which did of yore by Sandwich hauen lie,
Where now bound vp in Neptune's watrie bands,
They at this day are called Godwin sands,
   And since are made of pasture-springing-ground,
   A dangerous gulfe the sea-man to confound.

Thus for prince Alfred's blood, which I did shed,
Ioue in the tempest of his wrathfull mood,
Powe'd downe his wracke vpon my wretched hed:
Of all soule its most aduere vnto good,
Vengeance pursues the blushing sinne of blood,
   Blood out of earth with cries importunes heau'n
   To grant reuenge, vntill reuenge be giuen.

Vnto a sinfull wight, though time do seeme
With wings of waste his shame away to wipe,
Although the king of heau'n secure he deeme:
Yet when his sore of sinne is waxen ripe,
Of his smart scourge he feeleth the bitter stripe,
   The truth whereof, that I may testifie,
   Amongst thy Mirrors place my tragedie,
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

Againe he armes him to reuenge his wrong,
Fights with the king, whose part he finds too strong:
In fight is taken and to Cardif sent,
Where long captiu'd, in seeking to preuent
The fate of loathed thrall by secret flight,
He taken is, and is depriu'd of sight,
And after with long life in thrall opprest,
He pines away with hunger and vnrest,
Whose princely ghost let fame from grane vpraise
To make those deeds a Mirrour for our daies.”

ANOTHER ARGUMENT.
The Norman prince tells fame, how he was borne
To be a king, yet dies a duke forlone.

In that great booke of Ioue's decrees in heau'n,
Compiled ere time had any wings to moue,
The wofull wight, to whom blacke fate is giuen,
To cancell it in vaine doth after proue,
No change of time can change the will of Ioue,
What power so potent is, that can controle
The first decree that he did there inrole.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

2.

Let fortune hold a crowne above thy head,
And at it with wit's best direction aime,
Rise to it royally from honor's bed,
Lustily deserve it for thy deeds of fame:
Yet shall thy carefull brow neere beare the same,
  If thou in that star-text of euery thing
  Foredoom'd for fate, be not inrol'd a king.

3.

Of which that thou a lasting Mirror haue,
Behold me heere a wretched prince of yore,
To whom true birth a crowne and kingdom gaue,
Whom vertue did inrich with all her store
Of goodly gifts, to make me fit therefore,
  Of which depriu'd by destinie's decree,
  Woe and alas was only left to mee.

Behold this seeble bodie pin'd away
With hunger's waste, which once so stoutly bore
Our Saviour's badge in many a bold assay:
Behold the place where eyes haue stood before,
Now filled vp with blacke congealed gore:
  Behold blind Beauchampe duke of Normandie,
  New crept from graue to tell his tragedie.

5.

A prince I was borne of the Norman blood,
To that victorious king the eldest sonne,
Who with his Normans, like a furious flood
From southerne seas did England ouerrun,
And to his heires the golden garland wonne,
  Though beau'ns and fortune neuer would agree,
  That of the same I should possessor bee.
642  Robert, Duke of Normandy.

6.
When fortune's gentle hand had set the crowne
Upon his happie head, when all assaies
Of his bold foes in field were beaten downe,
To me his eldest borne my state to raise,
The Norman dukedome with such long delayes
Assigned was, that I being set on fire
For such protract, turn'd rebell 'gainst my sire.

7.
Like lustie Phaeton, that gaue th'assay,
To guide the head-strong horses of the sunne,
Puft vp with pride to seeke his owne decay,
Gainst conquering William his rebellious sonne,
T'aspir e the dukedome violently begun,
And fier'd with heat of growsome youth did venter,
With warlike troopes the Norman coast to enter.

8.
The false French Philip dreading euery houre,
The towring state of my vnconquer'd sire,
Gaue life to my attempt, and sent a powre
Of tall strong men, as fuel for the fire
Of my ambition, lest I should retire,
And faint in pursuit of the warre begun,
Betwixt my sire and me his gracelesse sonne.

9.
As th'hungrie flame grown powerfull by degrees,
And flying on wings of winde throughout a wood,
With thirstie tongue lickes vp the leasie trees,
Or as the rising of some stormie flood:
So blinded with neglect of humane good,
My native Normandie I did invade,
Making her soile the spoile of Mars his blade.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

14.
In th'heate of fight, I caus'd a troope of horse
To breake vpon the rereward of the foe,
Who brauely gane the charge, and with such force
Their fainting troopes in heapes did ouerthrow,
That they their rankes were forced to forgo,
Whom I well mounted on a tall strong steed,
To the maine battell did pursue with speed.

15.
Where vnnder th'ensigne of his royall armes,
T'encounter with the king it was my chance,
Who bent with his owne hands, to wreeke his harmes,
Did fiercely charge me with his well-aim'd lance,
'Gainst whom vnknowne my selfe I did aduance,
And in my winged course with staffe in rest,
I gaue the charge vpon his royall brest.

16.
But heau'n did calme false fortune's threatfull brow,
And did auert the point of my sharpe speare:
Yet by his ribs the flesh it vp did plow,
And running through his arme made blood appeare,
The stubborne staffe the king to ground did beare,
Who falling from his horse in mind dismai'd,
Vnto his men aloud did call for aid.

17.
The voice descri'd my error, and with speed
I downe dismounting to my royall sire,
Did take him vp, and for my gracelesse deed
His pardon vpon my knee, I did require,
Pleading mistake t'appese his kingly ire,
Whom I remounted, and from field conuey'd,
Lest danger should his noble life invade.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

18.
Meane time the horse troopes, who by me design'd
Gane charge vpon the flankers of the foe,
So beat the field about, that conquest shin'd
Vpon our helmes, slaughter and ouerthrow
On the adverse part infor't such workes of woe,
That all by flight sought saftie, none durst stay,
Rufus disgrac'd, and wounded went his way.

19.
Conquest in triumph on my brow did stand,
Fame did renowne my sword in euerie place,
Fortune with fame did ioyne her helping hand
With my displeased sire to winne me grace,
T'whom nature plead'd my vnhappie case,
And forc't him yeeld (that both in loue might liue)
What reason would, and rage denide to giue.

20.
Restor'd to grace like Saturn's god-like sonne,
To England I returned with the king,
Where Malcome in his absence had oerrun
The north from Tuuidale, where Tweed doth spring,
Vnto the Tine, whose streames such profit bring
Vnto that towne, which on her bankes doth stand,
Now call'd Newcastle built by my command.

21.
T'oppose the furie of th'inuading foe,
The king my late tri'de valor did imployn
The Tine with waftling waues did seeme to woe
My swift accesse, to saue her from th'annoy
Of her proud foes, who daylie did destroy
The towres and townes, which did themselues enrank
About her streames, vpon the pleasant banke.
21.

Where with my troopes, when I appeard in sight
Beneath the kinglie lyon marching on
Towards Tuuidale, to seeke the foes for fight,
Malcolm retirde beyond the Tweede, and none
In England's bounds durst stay to looke vpon
Our angrie host, for peace the foemen su'd,
Which for the common good I did conclude.

But leaue I now, to speake of blessed daies,
In which I liu'd true subject to my king,
Leaue we a while to memorize the praise
Of my best deeds, thy muse againe must sing
My rebell pride, whence worse effects did spring,
Mischiefe now tracts each step, that I do tread,
Vnlookt for plagues falles downe vpon my head.

24.

Suppose thou seest me on the German coast,
Clad in rebellious armes against my sire,
Trooping vp men, to make a compleat host,
Waging th'vnwilling mind with golden hire,
And hope of spoile, to furnish my desire:

Bent once againe, vnto my sire vnknowne,
To claime the Norman dukedom, as mine owne.

25.

But ere my wicked sword I could vnsheathe,
Vpon the bed of fraile mortalitie
Lies conquering William, in the armes of death,
T'whom envious fame in his extremitie,
Brings tidings of his sonne's impietie,
Debatefull enuie, finding once the thing
That breeds our shame, sets euill newes on wing.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

30.
Scarce had the hand of unimpeached death,
Clos'd vp the eyes of England's conquering king:
But fame, whose listning eares feeles every breath
Of whispering rumour, set him selfe on wig,
And ouer seas to vs did tidings bring,
That our dread sire was to his graue gone downe,
And vnto Rufus had bequeath'd his crowne.

31.
Heart-swolne with furie to revenge such wrongs,
And claime the pruiledge then almost lost,
Which vnto birth by nature's gift belongs,
Lest Rufus pride in my disgrace might boast,
My quarrell strengthen'd with a mightie host,
I did arrive on England's southerne shore,
Gainst whose white rocks the British billowes rore.

32.
The English peeres abhorring Rufus pride,
In me expecting a more milde command,
Both by affection and by dutie tide
T'advance my cause, each with his armed band,
Gainst Rufus' powers in field did stoutly stand,
Whose wilder nature knowne in former daies,
Now many friends to my attempt did raise.

33.
Th' vnconquered Kentish in the English east
With that stout bishop Odo, first made head,
The actiue people, coasting on the west,
Marcht beneath Mowbrai's ensigne proudly spread,
The northerne rout the valiant Bygod lead,
And the bold Britaines favouring my right,
Were troopt by braue Mountgomerie valiant knight.
Robert, Duke of Normandy. 649

34.
Th' usurping king seeing such se vere stormes to frowne,
On the first spring of his ambitious raigne,
Fearing the fall of his new-borne renowne,
Sought by insinuating words to gaine,
What by the sword he could not now maintaine,
His golden gifts with many faire sweet words,
Did turne the edge of our reuengeful swords.

35.
He did not seeke t' usurpe the crowne by might,
Such pride his loyall heart did nere inuade,
He knew my senior birth did claime that right,
He, we being absent, tooke in hand, he said,
In our behalfe the scepter then vsnswai'd,
The which, since now, he did the same enioy,
He crau'd to hold of vs, as our vice-roy.

36.
His gifts still flowing from him in excess,
Did giue full power to euery mouing word,
And that in me he might all doubts suppresse
Of fraudulent deceit, he did accord
That he of me, as of his supreme lord,
Should hold the crowne, and yearly I should claime
Three thousand markes, as tribute for the same.

37.
Fraternall loue so well her powers appli'd,
To end these iarres begun betwixt vs twaine,
That he constrain'd t' appease his wonted pride,
And I respecting glorie more then gaine,
Did reunite our selues in loue againe:
The frowne of Mars did bring his stomacke downe,
And golden gifts did calme our martiall frowne.

VOL. II. 4 O
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

38.
Farre from the fruitfull Albion's peacefull shoare,
For th'easterne world thy muse thou now must wing,
Who in her flight a loftie pitch must soare,
Of those stout pilgrims in high straine to sing,
Which th' holy hermit did to Salem bring,
Imploring aid of princes in the west,
Against the Pagan's bloodie acts in th'east.

39.
I as a partner in that great affaire,
With my support that iourney to vphold,
My wants with store to furnish, did not spare
My Norman dukedom, which for summes of gold
Till my returne the king did morgag'd hold;
   Gold doth men's thoughts to high attempts prepare,
   And ouergilds the danger of the warre.

40.
Hearken how fame vpon the Norman coast
With her shrill trumpe from kingdomes far away,
Summons vnto an head my warlike host,
Behold the sackfull troopes in braue array,
Beneath my ensignes for this bold assay,
   Who martiall'd by my hand, with ample traine,
   Do crowne the utmost bankes of Belgike Seine.

41.
Behold the English famous for his bow,
Sharpening his angrie arrows for the field,
The Scot with his long pike his cunning show,
The Britaine big-bon'd-bold, not borne to yeeld,
Addressing brauely both his sword and sheeld,
   See how the Norman manageth his horse,
   The Irish shakes his dart with manly force.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

42.
As wak'd from sleepe, with christians wofull cries,
Bound by the Saracen in captiue bands,
And often blushing at the late surprise
Of those milke-hony-flowing holy lands,
Now made the spoile of Pagan's conquering bands,
Hence did we march with heau'n's great king for guide
Into the east, to beate downe Pagan's pride.

43.
Inglorious age, made drunke with dregs of peace,
Heere lustly may I taxe thy peacefull time,
Heere must our muse's warlike song surcease,
A carping straine, a more inuectiue rime,
Doth best befit the nature of thy crime:
   Looke backe at vs, mourne thine owne want of praise
   And glorious deeds, to glorifie thy daies.

44.
Say glorie, say, hath peacefull sallie furl'd
Thy flag of honor? l'est thou dead in graue,
With great Heroes of the elder world,
Who led vs ouer Hellespontus wau'e
Beneath his badge, whose blood the world did wau'e?
   Aris, arise, call forth the christian man,
   Against the house of tyrant Ottoman.

45.
Hearke, how Thessalian woods records the cries
Of captiue'd Greekes vpon Peneus shore:
Behold how sacred Salem wasted lies:
See, see, how Sion mournes, where saints of yore
Did in sweet hymnes the king of heauen adore:
   Behold that blessed land, the cursed seat
   Where raignes th'Arabian Turkish Mahomet.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

46.
O warlike nation, where is now that name,
Which th’English sword did graine on Acon’s wall,
Why do your valours sleepe, vp, vp for shame,
Let not your countrie’s ancient glorie fall:
Go, free poore christians from proud Pagan’s thrall,
    Redeeme his sepulchre, who did redeeme
    The world from death, with blood of such esteeme.

47.
Transport thou now thy muse to Boosphorus’ brim,
Ouer whose waues from Iuno jealous dame,
To Asian meades of yore did Io swim,
From whom transform’d the streame then tooke his name,
And since that time hath still retain’d the same,
    Ouer whose waues as we did waft our host,
    Much christian blood we ‘gainst the Bulgar lost.

48.
Hence did we march to Hellespontus flood,
Where Helle, with yong Phrixus, put to flight
By stepdam’s rage, of which in feare they stood,
Flying, alas, and falling with a fright,
Into the waue sunke downe in Phrixus’ sight:
    Yet still to live, in leauing her deare breath,
    She left her name to Pontus at her death.

49.
The coast we tooke, where once Abydos stood,
Whence nak’d Leander, wafted by the light
Of Hero’s loue, so often swom the flood,
Till Helle rauisht with so sweet a sight,
Enjoying Hero’s hap, in her despight
    Into the deepe her deare Leander drew,
    Where to his loue he sigh’d his last adew.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

50.

There on the plaines, where Troye's sad ruines stand,
Whence Agamemnon's troope haue often run,
To shun the furie of great Hector's hand,
Against the Pagan many deeds were done
Beneath our standard of Ioue's powerfull sonne,
There all the host, as towards Nice we past,
With spoilefull bands laid all the countrie wast.

51.

The noble citie Nice, so strongly wall'd,
We with our conquering host begirt round,
Her gates we wonne, her turret's tops we scall'd,
Her towring walles we equall'd with the ground,
And all her pride did in the fire confound;
Amongst whose spoiles great Solyman's faire make,
With her deare children we did captiue take.

52.

Then did stout Heraclea stoope her pride
And seeing the Niceans yeeld, did yeeld with them,
From thence to Tarsus we our host did guide,
Fast by the bankes of Cydnus, whose sweet streame
Did seeme t'inionite vs to that stratageme,
Wafting vs, with slow wate:rs sliding downe
From mountaine Taurus, vnto Tarsus towne.

53.

Where when we came with sp'rite infus'd from heauen,
We through the walles did force our dreadfull way,
The mightie towne into our hands was giuen,
The captiue foes in pitifull dismay,
With teares bemoan'd the imminent decay
Of their strong walles, which Perseus so renown'd
Had long before erected from the ground.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

54.
Thence our triumphant standards we advance
To Syria-ward with Godfrey for our guide,
Where on the way, with service of my lance
In many a fight against the adverse side,
I with fresh strength our fainting host supplied,
And forc'd the Pagan Pyrrhus from the field,
Who fled, and made faire Antioch wals his shield.

55.
Whom we pursu'd, and by the siluer streames
Of swift Orontes, where the king of light
Vpon our armes did cast his golden beames,
Our troopes did tracke the foe-men, turn'd to flight,
Till Antioch towers shot vp themselves in sight,
Whose pride we menac'd with victorious armes,
And shooke it in long siege with loud alarmes.

56.
Nine times the pale-fac'd queene of peacefull night,
Did lose that siluer lustre in her wane,
Which she receiu'd from Phoebus cheerefull sight,
And nine times did her brothers light againe
Renue that losse, which she did erst sustaine,
While Antioch walles our armie did enclose,
And stood in daily skirmish with the foes.

57.
In the ninth month, vpon the topfull brow
Of the towne-gate, the flag of truce did waue,
The captaine Pyrrhus haughtie heart did bow,
The citie stoop't her pride, and for to save
Her selfe from spoile, her gates wide open gaue,
Whose wealth, as due reward of our long toile
To th'vniversall host, was given for spoile.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

58.
Should I assay to tell each conquest wonne,
Which at that time the christian host did crowne,
Or bring to light each high achievement done,
Before we could attaine that sacred towne,
Which God's sonne's sepulchre doth so renowne,
Our muse, though willing all at large to show,
Yet were too weake such task to undergo.

59.
See how the Persian fronts vs in the field,
Vnder the sway of whose huge horse-arm'd host,
The earth with bowing backe doth seeme to yeeld,
Whose troopes in number infinite doth boast
Our swift decay, ere we do crosse their coast,
Hemming vs round, in hope t'enrich their hands,
With noble conquest on our conquering bands,

60.
With shouts, and war-like instruments loud sound,
Hid all in clouds of smoake they toward vs came,
In fearefull fight vs the groaning ground
Both hosts encounter'd, glorie did enflame
Both bent to fight, both greedie after fame,
Standrd 'gainst standrd stood, and band 'gainst band,
Troope clos'd with troope, men sing'd hand to hand.

61.
Corbona hight, a Persian farre renown'd,
Chargeth our host with all his troopes of horse,
Stiffe stands each regiment, no ranke giues ground,
Power beats backe power, and force repelleth force,
The foes repell'd doth often shift their course,
Oft charging and recharging every ward,
Where they do find the rankes most vnprepar'd:
Then thicke as haile from aire's darke regiment,
When in blacke clouds a tempest raues in skie,
Steele-headed shafts from th' English bowes are sent,
Threatning the armed men as they do flie,
With singing slaughter, thicke prepar'd on high,
Who in their flight, though some fall short of wounds,
Yet some againe both men and horse confounds.

Here th'angrie courser chaft with deadlie sting
Of wounding shaft, for verie paine and woe
Doth stampe, doth plunge, and vp from ground doth fling,
Doth snuffe, doth puffe, doth boggle, snore and blow,
Till from his back his rider he doth throw:
Then ranging through their host with sinewie shankes
He wounds his friends, disturbing all their rankes.

There one with shaft infixed in his brest,
As the stalke stoopes his top orecharg'd with seed,
Hangs downe his head: another here opprest
With feare of death, forsakes his wounded steed,
Each place throughout the field our eyes did feed
With ruine of the foes dispred on ground,
Gasping for breath with many a bleeding wound.

Greate Ioue the god of conquest, who from harme
Did garde our host in euerie such assay,
Did through the cloudes stretch out his mightie arme,
And on the foes did powre downe swift decay,
Slaughtering their men on heapes, few fled away:
Twice fiftie thousand dead in field did fall,
With stout Corbina their cheife generall.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

66.
Here could I tell the sack, which did decline
The pride of Salem, whose high walles withstood
Our fierce assaults twice fifteene dayes and nine,
How euerie street polluted with the blood
Of Pagans slaine, did seeme a crimson flood:
   How Egypt's Soldan did before vs fall,
   Whom to these wars, this towne distrest did call.

67.
But back to England we must turne our eye,
From whence, since first to Palestine I came,
Fine times bright Pisces in the azure skie
Had in their yerelie course outrun the Ram,
Whose iust returne againe begins the same,
   Where in our absence let vs view in state,
   What changes haue ben wrought by time and fate.

68.
Our brother Rufus with unrighteous hand,
Swaying the scepter in the English throne,
Did so oppresse the people of his land,
That, when he left to liue, he then left none,
That would as friends his suddaine death bemone:
   He in that forrest did death's cup carouse,
   Which fatall was vnto the conqueror's house.

69.
A goodlie place, that forrest once had ben,
Where manie a towne and manie a temple stood,
Made sacred with the prayers of holie men,
All which without respect to common good,
My father did convert into a wood,
   Intitling it New Forrest, and for game,
   Did after keepe wild beasts within the same.
Which stir'd the stormeful wrath of heauen's great king,
Who seeing his temples equald with the ground,
And where his priests sweet pæans once did sing,
And oft with thankfull prayers his altars crownd,
Hearing the cric of th'hunter and his hound,
Did in that place punish th'impietie
Upon my sire, in his posteritie.

His second sonne, my brother Richard hight,
A hopefull youth, whom nature's hand had sto 'd
With sweetes of youth, as he, for his delight,
Did range this wood, was through the boolie gor'd
By saunge beasts, whose death my sire deplor'd
With bitter teares: yet could not quench the fire
Of Ione's fierce wrath, so moued was his ire.

Rufus, his third borne sonne, in that same wood,
When he had strook an hart that fled his sight,
Was by another crost, where as he stood,
At whom one Tirill call'd, a Norman knight,
A shaft let flie, which in the lucklesse flight
Missing the deere, and glancing on the ground,
Upon the brest the king to death did wound.

He dead, yong Henrie for his learning skill
Surnamed Beauclerk, did aspire the crowne,
And wonne the English peeres vnto his will:
Fortune once more vpon my state did frowne,
Aud from ambitious throne did keepe mee downe,
Mocking my hopes, denying mee command,
When she had put a scepter in my hand.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

74.
After the conquest of Jerusalem,
The princes did amongst themselves accord,
To crown my temples with the diadem,
That my abode might in distress afford
Comfort t' all christians against the heathen sword:
    But tidings of my brother Rufus fall,
    From Palestine to England me did call.

75.
That sword renown'd with fall of Pagan foes
    I ow did brandish against my brother's breast,
That shield, which did the Persian oft oppose
In skirmish in the field, was now address'd
Against my friends, to work mine own unrest:
    And all mine ensignes fam'd in foreign fight
At Winchester did wave in Henrie's sight.

76.
Where, close to swords in fight we would have stood
Had not our friends foreseen the future harms
Of our debate, who tending either's good,
To calm the tempest of warre's threatfull storms,
First caus'd vs lay aside our angrie armes,
    Then counsell'd Henrie to such covenants yeeld
    As Rufus did, when he the state did weeld.

77.
As he, while he did live, for England's crown,
Injoynd was by general states decree
Three thousand marks each yeare to pay me downe,
So Henrie, younger borne by birth, then he,
To like conditions thenceforth should agree,
    To which we both consenting did depart,
    One from the other seeming please in hart.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

78.
But hooded with the shew of outward love,
Beguiling my simplicitie of mind,
He in the end a deadly foe did prove,
In my frank brest by nature too too kind,
A cunning way to catch me he did find:
  Into the best minds pliable to good,
  Deceit soone enters maskt in truth's plaine hood.

79.
His queene, a woman sweetly tounge'd and faire,
By whom the king at his desire did aime,
With speech so affable did so insnare
My princely pliant thoughts, that in the same,
She could imprese, what forme she pleas'd to frame:
  So free was I, that what her heart could craue,
  As was my wont, with prodige hand I gaue.

80.
The tribute due for England's emperie,
At her request I freely gane away,
Whereby my title and my dignitie
I lost, in that I could not then gain-say
A queene's request, proud Henrie had his prey:
  A woman's power to proue my power but vaine,
  What I had done did soone vndoe againe.

81.
Wanting in after times necessitie,
Those golden sinewes of my dukedome's state,
To strengthen my much weaken'd royalty,
I gaue the king words of despitefull hate,
And for revenge tooke armes: but froward fate
  With clouds of shame did now eclipse the shine
  Of all my conquests, won in Palestine.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

82.

Ore the sea's narrow brest from England's coast
To Normandie my furious brother came,
Gainst whom, my cause being good with my small host,
Before the fort of Tenerchbray by name:
Though fewer farre, in battel's bloodie frame
  We did aduaunce, where though Mortaigne and I
  So stoutly fought, our folke the field did flie.

83.

Vpon that day, when fortie yeares before,
My sire to conquer England gaue th'assay,
In which he first set foot on England's shore,
The king and I did meet in battell ray,
In which, alas, we Normans lost the day:
  For on that day the Normans England won,
  Was Normandie by English men orerun.

84.

Where, though false fortune turn'd her treacherous face,
And then began to worke our future woe,
Though dreadful Pallas did denie vs grace,
And 'gainst our side her selfe in field did show,
Yet did we scorne, as scar'd, to flie the foe,
  Mortaigne and I 'gainst them alone did fight,
  Till multitudes did ouermatch our might.

85.

Let Pallas cease to sing of armes oppos'd,
Sorrow must be the subiect of her song,
In stead of greaues with golden buttons clos'd,
In which she marcht amidst our martiall throng,
Now in sad straine, while we relate our wrong,
  She in the sock the tragicke dance must lead,
  Whose dolefull measures, we captiu'd do tread.
Thy muse, that in warre's bloodie hew was sent
To Palestine, must now in blacke be found,
Each word with heauie fall she must accent,
Each symphonie must yeld a dolefull sound,
Each measure with a captiue band be bound,
And every couple's sad catastrophe,
Double the woes of our captiuitie.

Now Normandie's great duke in Henrie's hand
Upon the routleing billowes running high,
Is carried captiue from his natuie land,
To which oft turning backe his heauie eie,
It seems a farre to follow him and crie,
"A dew, deare lord, adew, who neuer more
With one step's touch shall grace my sandie shore."

With griefe arriu'd on Cardiffe's rockie coast,
Where Scuerne first meets Nereus wauie brood,
Through whose blacke waues faire Sabrine's guiltlesse ghost,
T'Elizium bankes did passe the fatall flood,
In whose defence king Locrine lost his blood,
The tyrant king, in dread what might befall,
Did confine me within the castle wall.

As bird in cage debarr'd the vs of wings,
Her captiue life as nature's chiefest wrong,
In dolefull dittie sadly sits and sings,
And mournes her thralled libertie so long,
Till breath be spent in many a sitthfull song:
So beere captiue'd, I many daies did spend
In sorowe's plaint, till death my daies did end.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

90.
Where as a prisoner, though I did remaine:
Yet did my brother grant this libertie,
To quell the common speech, which did complaine
On my distresse, and on his tyrannie,
That in his parkes and forrests joyning by,
   When I did please, I to and fro might goe,
   Which in the end was cause of all my woe.

91.
For on a time, when as Aurora bright
Began to scale heav'n's steepie battlement,
And to the world disclose her cheerefull light,
As was my wont, I with my keeper went
To put away my sorrowe's discontent:
   Thereby to ease me of my captiue care,
   And solace my sad thoughts in th'open aire.

92.
Wandring through forrest wide, at length we gaine
A steepe cloud-kissing rocke, whose horned crowne
With proud imperiall looke beholds the maine,
Where Scoern's dangerous waues run rolling downe
From th'Holmes into the seas, by Cardiffe towne,
   Whose quicke deuouring sands so dangerous been
   To those, that wander Amphytrite's greene.

93.
As there we stood, the countrie round we ey'd
To view the workmanship of nature's hand,
There stood a mountaine, from whose weeping side
A brooke breaks forth into the low-lying land,
Here lies a plaine, and there a wood doth stand,
   Here pastures, meades, corne-fields, a vale do crowne,
   A castle here shootes vp, and there a towne.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

94.
Here one with angle ore a siluer streame
With banefull baite the nibling fish doth feed:
There in a plow'd-land with his painefull teame,
The plowman sweates, in hope for labor's meed
To get the earth with childe of Ceres' seed:
   Heere sits a goatheard on a craggie rock,
   And there in shade a shepheard with his flock.

95.
The sweet delight of such a rare prospect
Might yeeld content vnto a carefull eye:
Yet downe the rock descending in neglect
Of such delight, the sunne now mounting high
I sought the shade in vale, which low did lie,
   Where we reposde vs on a greene wood side,
   Afront the which a siluer streame did glide.

96.
There dwelt sweet Philomel, who neuer more
May bide th'abode of man's societie,
Lest that some sterner Tereus then before,
Who crot the flower of her virginitie,
Gainst her should plot some second villanie:
   Whose dolefull tunes to minde did cause me call
   The woefull storie of her former fall.

97.
The redbreast, who in bush fast by did stand
As partner of her woes, his part did plie,
For that the gifts, with which Autumnus hand
Had grac'd the earth, by winter's wrath should die,
From whose cold cheekes bleake blasts began to flie
   Which made me think vpon my summer past
   And winter's woes, which all my life should last.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

98.
My keeper with compassion mou'd to see,
How grieve's impulsions in my brest did beate,
Thus silence broke: "Would God, my lord," quoth he,
"This pleasant land, which nature's hand hath set
Before your eyes, might cause you to forget
Your discontent, the object of the eye
Oft times gives ease to woes, which inward lie.

99.
Behold vpon that mountaine's top so steepe,
Which seemes to pierce the clouds and kisse the skie,
How the gray shepheard driues his flock of sheepe
Downe to the vale, and how on rockes fast by
The goates frisk to and fro for iollitie:
Glue care likewise vnto these birds sweet songs,
And let them cause you to forget your wrongs."

100.
To this I made replie: "Fond man," said I,
"What vnder heau'n can slack th'increasing woe,
Which in my grieued hart doth hidden lie?
Of choice delight what object canst thou show,
But from the sight of it fresh grieve doth grow?
What thou didst whilome point at to behold,
The same the summe of sorrow doth infold.

101.
That gray coat shepheard, whom from farre we see,
I liken vnto thee, and those his sheepe
Vnto my wretched self compar'd may bee:
And though that carefull pastor will not sleepe,
When he from raenous wolues his flock should keepe:
Yet here, alas, in thrall thou keepest me,
Vntill that woole my brother hungrie bee.

vol. II.
& Q
666   Robert, Duke of Normandy.

102.

Those shaghaird' goates upon the cragge hill,
Which thou didst shew, see how they friske and play,
And euerie where doe run about at will:
Yea when the lion markes them for his prey,
They ouer hills and rockes can fie away;
But when that lion fell shall follow me.
To shed my blood, O whither shall I flee?

103.

Those sweet-voic'd birds, whose aires thou dost commend,
To which the echoing wood returnes replie,
Though thee they please, yet me they do offend:
For when I see, how they do mount on hie,
Wauing their out-stretcht wings at libertie:
Then do I thinke, how bird-like in a cage
My life I leade, and griefe can never swage."

104.

Heree sighes broke off my speech, and that in mind
I vndisturb'd might in that place bemone
The lot adiudg'd to me by fates vnkind,
I did command my keeper to be gone,
And there to l ease me to my selfe alone,
Who doubting nothing what I would assay,
Left me, as was his wont, and went his way.

105.

He being gone, I wandring to and fro,
Began t' imagine how I might preuent
My wretched thrall, doom'd endlessse by my foe,
T' attempt all danger I stood fully bent,
Finding the meanes to perfect my intent,
Which at the last I found, alas, the while,
Since fawning fortune did my hopes beguile.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

106.

Alone long wandring through the desert wood
Farre from the castle, I did chance t'espie,
Whereas a lustie gelding grasing stood,
Whom straight I backt, and did for freedome flie
Through vnknowne waies, that none might me descrie:
   But what is hid from heau'n, or who can shun
   God's firme edict, by which all things are done?

107.

In swift careire, as I did heedlesse passe,
And through a meadow greene did make my way,
In midst of which a muddie quauemire was,
Into the same my horse did fall, and lay
Vp to the bellie, which my flight did stay,
   Where striuing, as I was from thence t'haue past,
   They that pursu'd me, found me sticking fast.

108.

To Cardiffe thence they bore me backe againe,
As one whom frowning fortune did despise,
And to the king of me they did complaine,
Who with himselfe did tyrant-like deuise,
That I for this offence should lose mine eies:
   Which when he tooke, what did he leaue behind,
   But woe in captiue bands to leade the blind?

109.

My bodie thus the darkesome caue was made,
In which my soule abode, as it had been
Confin'd to dwell in house of endlesse shade,
The windowes shut, no light could enter in,
The light put out no comfort could be scene:
   And left thus blind, I seeke to flie my foes,
   Both soule and bodie Cardiffe doth inclose.
110.
Bidding farewell vnto the world for euer,
There in my chamber, as a forlorne guest,
My wretched selfe I wilfully did seuer
From all resort, where with long night opprest
(For day did shun the place of mine vnrest)
  To yeld griefe passage, after sad sighes giuen,
  Thus oft I call'd, with hands vp-lift to heau'n.

111.
"Thou powerfull God, whose champion I haue been
Fiue cold bleake winters, both by day and night,
In field against the cursed Saracen,
Although I seeeme forgotten in thy sight,
Yet now behold me heere a wofull wight:
  And seeing I liue in such calamitie,
  Send death to end my dolefull miserie.

112.
Can I distinguish day from dairesome night?
Or do I know the seasons of the yeare?
Know I when spring deckes earth with sweet delight,
When summers sun glads earth with his bright cleare,
Or when in woods Autumnus' fruits appeare?
  O no, of nought but winter can I tell,
  Whom by his boystrous blasts, I know right well.

113.
Where is become that azure concauite,
That doth so many wonders rare infold?
Where all the host of starres, so infinite?
Where daies great monarch drawne in carre of gold?
Where nightes bright queene, so beautious to behold?
  O still, they do remaine in heau'n's faire frame,
  Although I neuer more shall see the same.
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

114.

Where now the valley greene, and mountaine bare,
The riuers, forrest, wood, and crystall springs,
The hauke, the hound, the hinde, the swift-foot hare,
The lute's sweet straine, the voice that sweetly sings,
And princely sports in courts of mightie kings?
   Where now are these? O let not memorie
   With thought of these augment my miserie.

115.

Here do I sit in shades of darkenesse grim,
While others walke in light at libertie:
Here I in waues of woufull teares do swim,
Condoling my unhappie miserie,
While others laugh, and sing for iollitie:
   Send then, O God, send death for my reliefe,
   Too heauie is the burthen of my grieue.”

116.

Thus many times, with bitter plaint and mone,
To ytter woes in words I did assay,
Witness ye wastefull walles, whose flintie stone
Have euon dropte teares, to heare me night and day,
With pitious voice lament mine owne decay,
   Oft wishing death, which sorow in the end,
   And Henrie's vnhind scoffe did timelesse send.

117.

For as he should vpon a solemn day
Make triall of a scarlet vestiment,
The cape being straite, the which he did assay
To put vpon his head, by chance did rent,
Which with this scornewull scoffe to me he sent,
   “Vnto our brother beare the same,” said he,
   “We know he hath a sharper bead then we.”
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

118.
The garment being brought, the rent I found,
At which my troubled thoughts so grieued were,
That many doubts did in the same abound,
Which made me aske of him, that did it beare,
If any one before the same did weare:
Who told me of the king's disdainfull scorne,
And how by chance the same by him was torne.

119.
Affliction bleeding fresh at this wide wound,
My heart grieve's burthen could no longer beare,
But downe I cast my selfe vpon the ground,
Where I with wretchen hands, the hoarie heare
From off my aged head, alas, did teare,
And when my tongue was free, against my foe
I forcd it utter forth these words of woe.

120.
"Woe, woe is me, that I was ever borne
Of halfe so many yeares to liue the space,
And in the end to liue my brother's scorne,
Yea treble woe to me, since such disgrace
Doth in despight my former deeds deface:
Then perish all my deeds, be never seene,
Die fame with shame, as it had never beene.

121.
Could not disdainfull Henrie be content,
Into his hands my kingdome to surprise,
Could not my thralldome cause him to relent,
Nor th' unsustained losse of both mine eyes
His rage 'gainst me his brother yet suffice?
But must he thus my princely state abuse,
And as an almesman his owne brother use?
Robert, Duke of Normandy.

122.

Why haue yee then, ah why, haue yee thus long,
Ye vuremorsefull fates produc'd that thread
Of loathed life, by life to lengthen wrong?
Why clip ye not my clew? why am I fed
With breath of life, and yet in life am dead?
   Curst be such fate, and curst that fatall hower,
   When first begot, I came within your power."

123.

Hardned with griefe, in spight of death to die,
Thenceforth as loathing life I stopt mine cares,
When hungrie food for appetite did crie:
And while with hunger nature slowly weares,
My food was sighes, my drinke grieves mournfull teares,
   Famine at length did blow the baneful breath,
   Whose bitter blast did strike my soule with death.

124.

Euen as the naked woods, whose greene is lost,
Clad in hoare, their ruth do seeme to show,
In teares turn'd t'ysicles by wintrie frost:
So I my head made white with age and woe,
While from th'eyes organs teares downe drizeling flow,
   When as I did perceiue approching death,
   Thus tooke my last farewell with fainting breath.

125.

"Adiew the daies, that did my dole prolong,
Adiew the nights, that vexed me so sore,
Adiew false fortune, cause of all my wrong,
Who laughs to scorne the same I won of yore,
Adiew O wrongfull world for evermore:
   Ye that conspir'd my sorowes to renew
   Both daies, nights, fortune, world and all adew.
672  Robert, Duke of Normandy.

126.
These hands to thee (O God) that for a gift
Thine owne deare Sonne for sin to death did yeeld,
These hands, I say, to thee I now do lift,
Which once did beare thy badge in brazen shield,
Against the Pagan foes in many a field,
Beseaching thee, from whom all mercies flowes,
To grant such grace, as death may end my woes.

127.
Twice fortie yeares and more, my daies haue ben,
And twice fifteene the Ram his race hath runne,
Since first, O Cardiffe, as in darkesome den,
Within thy walles mew'd vp from sight of sunne,
Forlorn, to mourne my fortunes I beganne:
Then pitie take, O God, on th'aged blind,
Death now begins my captuie bands t'vnbind.

128.
Leade on, leade on, vnto that heau'ny place,
Where in eternall blisse my soule must dwell,
Flie faith before, sue penitence for grace,
Backe, backe, my grieue, and vnto Henrie tell,
Beauchamp is dead, Cardiffe adew, farewell:"
This said, I downe did sinke into my bed,
In which my soule did leaue the bodie dead.

129.
Thus hast thou heard the Norman's blind duke tell
His fame in forren parts, the wretched wracke
Of his renowne, and cause for which he fell:
The judge of heau'n to punish is not slacke,
Where men do cast heau'n's gifts behind their backe:
Of which let my sad life in Cardiffe lead,
A lasting Mirrour be, though I be dead.
THE MEMORABLE LIFE
and death of King Richard the first, surnamed Cœur de Lion.

THE ARGUMENT.

"This prince," quoth Memorie, "did liue too long,
At his sterne brother's hands to bare such wrong,
Which yet revenged was by God's owne hand,
Upon himselfe, his children, and his land:
Two sonnes he had, of daughters also twaine,
Of which three drown'd, were swallow'd in the maine,
The fourth a daughter was, which Maud by name,
Of whom Plantagenet's two houses came:
Duke Gefferie of Aniou, noble knight,
Upon this Maud begate that worthie wight,
Duke Henrie, second king that bore that name,
Though second to no king in deeds of fame,
Who, oong, yet forc'd th' usurper Stephen in fight
To leaue to him the crowne, his due by right:
He in chast bed begot three sonnes and one,
Hight Henrie, Richard, Gefferie, and John:
Mongst whom that Richard when both Henries dide,
On England's throne did sit as supreme guide,
Since William's conquest, only he of kings
His host in person against the Pagan brings,
He sackes Messina, beats the Cypriotes bold,
Captines their barbarous king in gyues of gold,
Richard Cœur de Lion.

Takes Acon’s towers,
And left forlorn, yet still
Of Saladin in field, a
He makes all Syria sub
Prince John rebels, the
To captive bands, and
At his return he crow
And is by traitor's hand
The truth of which the

Fame's silver trumpets

King Richard Cœur de

THE wrath of heau'n did
With secret judgement
That against their parent
Nature displeas’d at suc
Against it selfe, it selfe
Causing the starrs at once aboute bus’d,
With bad aspects to frowne vp’nt the earth.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

Seldome such cursed insects in our kind
Escape the scourge of hatefull destinie,
Vnhappie chance in judgement is assign'd
Till death, to follow such impietie,
Which to the world my life might testifie,
   If any in this age with painefull pen,
   Had made the same a Mirrour vnto men.

3.
Why should the glorie of so great a king
Be darkned by obliuion's cloudie frowne?
Why should this age, as loathing every thing
Of th'elder world, my trophies all cast downe,
And let my deeds in waues of silence drowne?
   As if twixt best and worst no ods there were,
   When both alike are laid vpon the bere.

4.
Long hauing slept, and now rouz'd vp by fame
That keeps the due reward of doing well,
In hope thy pen will helpe to raise my name
Out of obliuion's den where it did dwell,
In course I come my storie's truth to tell:
   That by the praise, or displeasse of my name,
   Others may make a Mirrour of the same.

5.
Of noble Henrie, second of that name,
The second sonne I am of sonnes twice two,
Yet second vnto none in worthie fame,
If yeelded were to me my praises due,
As may appeare by that which shall ensue:
   First Richard call'd, first true borne English king,
   That wore the crowne since Normans conquering.
676 Richard Cœur de Lion.

6.
In large discourse to light I will not bring,
The obloquie of that now loathed crime,
In stubborne youth against my lord and king,
Blushing, I wish all such records of time
In darknesse dead, and wrapped vp in slime:
Yet seeing that truth bids hide no part of blame,
I will in briefe blaze out mine owne defame.

7.
My father's browes with prints of age repleate,
Fortune that erst did smile, began to frowne,
Abus'd by flatterie and his owne conceat,
As bent with wilfull hands to hasten downe
The statefull dignitie of his renowne:
His eldest borne he made his fellow king,
From whose ambition his distresse did spring.

8.
Yong Henrie sharing equall dignitie,
And hauing set one foot within the throne,
Pufft vp with pride to make a monachie
Of his new state, he would be king alone,
A partner in the crowne he would haue none:
Which pride of mind with bad advice borne higher,
Caus'd him rebell against his royall sire.

9.
To strengthen his ambition yet but yong,
The false French king in person did support
His part in field: and to be yet more strong,
The Scot and Flemming he did both exhort
With them against aged Henrie to consort,
To whom both I and Gefferie my brother
Did gieue consent, excited by our mother.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

10.

Not one of vs whom nature's band did bind
With due allegiance to our sire and king,
Did vnto nature's selfe not proue vnkind,
Yet could not power preuaile, nor enuie's sting
Against our sire, whom heau'n did helpe to bring
Our stubborne neckes againe beneath his yoke,
Our knees did stoope to his victorious stroke.

11.

Oft did we threaten ruine to his state,
His Norman dukedome with warre's wastefull spoile
We did deface, and sought to set debate
Twixt him and his: yet after all our toile,
At his weake hands we did receive the foile:
So just is heau'n to patron right against wrong,
And guard the weake with strength against the strong.

12.

To future time the king to leaue report
Of our rebellion and his long vnrest,
Did cause to be depainted in his court
A pellican, who breeds beneath his brest
Four yeong with tender care in his warme nest,
Of which three waxing strong, vnkindly rise
And pecke his brest, the fourth peckes out his eies.

13.

By the three first, he did decipher forth,
Geffrie, my selfe, and Henrie his first sonne:
The fourth was stubborne John his yongest birth,
Of whom when he was likewise left alone,
He beat his manly brest with age foredone,
And ending griece in death, to vs vnkind,
My selfe and John, he left his curse behind.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

14.
The sinne that drew these plagues vpon his head,
Was wanton lust and loose lasciuous life,
Burnt with desire, he left his lawfull bed,
For which the jealous queene his angrie wife,
Twixt him and vs stirr’d vp debatefull strife:
Mischeife pursues the steps that false do proue,
In the firme covenant of sinlesse loue.

Vnhappie we, his gracelesse sonnes that were
The rods of heau’n’s reuenge for his misdeed,
Did the reward of our rebellion beare,
In vs our father’s curse, the plaguefull meed
Of disobedience after did succeed,
The rods, with which loue executes his ire,
He oft in judgement casts into the fire.

16.
When Henrie crown’d a king in royall throne
And made in state coequall with our sire,
Attempting oft the souveraignetie alone
In sway of scepter, which he did aspire,
And yet could never compass his desire:
With indignation at his fortunes creas’d
Being stricken to the heart his health he lost.

17.
And seeing in sickness with repentant eies,
The vglie shape of sinne, heart-freez’d with cold,
Of death’s pale terror, he for mercie cries,
And begs but this, that he may but behold
Our father’s face, ere he be wrapt in mould:
Which last request our father him deni’d,
Doubting deceit in death, when Henrie di’d.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

18.
My yonger brother Britaine's Gefferie,
A partner with vs in rebellious pride,
To pay iust paines for his dialoyaltie
Vnto our father, bruized on the side
With fall from off his horse, vt timely dide:
   In youth cut off, as most vnworthie life,
   That with his father liu'd in rebell strife.

19.
This vengeance for such disobedient sin,
Vnto my brethren as in mercie sent,
Might to my future deeds haue cauets bin:
But I in heart too stubborne to relent,
And proud prince Iohn did once again consent,
   To lift rebellious hands against our sire,
   In his last daies when age did rest require.

20.
The French king's power we did support in field,
And did in armes the aged king constraine
To such dishonor'd tearmes of truce to yeeld,
That he in heart vnable to sustaine
The griefe of such disgrace, with sorrow slaine,
   In those last words which dying he did breath,
   To vs his curse most iustly did bequeath.

21.
After his death, to shew that griefe and shame
Of my misdeeds, did put his soule to flight,
His cold dead corps, as I beheld the same,
Streaming out blood did shew the great despight
That it conceiu'd at my detested sight:
   Which forc'd griefe's drops to dew my manly face,
   Toucht at the heart with shame of such disgrace.
Thus hauing blaz'd out those vnnaturall crimes,
The wicked brood of my degenerate pride,
I will no longer vilifie thy rimes:
Thou now to tell what after did betide
Vnto the house of fame, thy muse must guide,
   And mount her thoughts to th' highest pitch of glorie,
   In loftie straine to sing my golden storie.

No sooner was the kingdome's scepter scene
In my right royall hand, but that in mind
Transform'd I was from what I once had beene,
And turn'd my back to fore-past shame: heau'n shin'd
Vpon my head, thoughts only now enclin'd
   To actions of true praise did heau'n aspire,
   Forren affaires gaue wings to my desire.

For absolution for my trespass done
Against my sire, when I did understand
How Saladine, the Pagan prince, had wonne
The sacred Salem and the holy land,
Which christian princes did of late command:
   The christian badge I bore vpon my brest,
   And did direct my iorney towards the east.

The ablest men through my large emperie,
That I could chuse for this so great affaire,
From England, Guien, Poyctou and Normandie,
From Britaine and from Aniou did prepare,
Themselves in best habillments of warre,
   T'inside their father's steps, and gaine againe
   What they had wonne, and we could not retaine.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

26.
Report from Rome did tidings daily bring,
Who stood in feare of th'heathen's bold assay,
How mightie Saladin the Pagan king,
Had proudly purpos'd Palestine's decay,
To glut the gulf of his vsaciate pray,
Wishing vs hasten to the christian aid,
Who ouer-match't with power, were much dismay'd.

27.
The warre-god rouz'd with ratling drumme's alarme,
Rose vp and left his lonely lemman's bed,
Himselfe he for the field did brauely arme,
Tooke vp his mightie launce, and boldly led
Our battels forth, with crosse-fam'd ensignes spred,
On which as marching we infixt our eies,
We hastned on to meet our enemies.

28.
Leauing my kingdome's state beneath the sway
Of four estate, in peace to kepe the same,
I crost the seas and tooke my readie way
To Lyons that French towne: where when I came
The king I met, then Philip call'd by name,
Who for this great affaire had vow'd to goe
With his support against the common foe.

29.

Our armies being joyn'd, we marched on,
Where that strong bridge that ouerlookes the waue
Of Rodanus, beneath our feet did grone,
And brake, where many, whom no helpe could saue,
In that blacke strugling streame did find their graue:
At which dismay'd, to part we did agree,
And after both to meet in Scicillie.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

30.
From hence ore aged Tython's purple bed,
For Scicilie thy muse must take her flight
To mount Pelorus, on whose loftie head,
Let her insist and view our nauall might
Afloat vpon those seas, so faire a sight
    King Philip on the shore with his French powers
    Did then admire from off Messanae's towers:

31.
There do behold my men in thickest throng,
Scaling Messanae's walles, and beating downe
The citie gates in wreake of that foule wrong
Done against vs all by that injurious towne,
Who with first conquest did our sword renowne:
    Upon whose walles our banners we did pight,
    Which did the false French Philip much despight.

32.
In spight of hate the cause we did protect
Of our queene sister, Joan of Scicilie,
Whose husband dead, prince Tancred late elect
To sway the scepter of that emperie,
Did with vnfit repulse her due denie,
    Till now at length he by our power compell'd,
    Did yeeld her dowrie, which he long withheld.

33.
Keeping the feast of his natuuite,
Whose birth true peace t'all humane soules did bring,
In Tancred's court, there first the treacherie
Of faithlesse Philip, that ignoble king,
Did shew it selfe: who did intend to bring
    All my desiguenments for the christian aid,
    To ill effect by plots which he had laid.
Richard Cœur de Lion.  683

34.
The stout Sicilian king he did excite
T'innuade my campe, and that he might not faile,
He wisht him take th'advantage of the night:
And lest my dreaded might his mind might quail,
He with his power would helpe him to assaile:
    So much did he maligne my name's renowne,
    Which all true noble hearts with praise did crowne.

35.
But I that did preferre a royall minde
Before base thoughts of griping avarice,
And prince-like did with bountie's hands strike blinde
The eyes of enuie in mine enemies,
Did finde such grace, that none could prejudice
    My name or state, but euen amongst my foes
    I found such friends as would the same disclose.

36.
Tancred that did admire the royalties,
That in my kingly brest did make repose,
Could not conceale the French-man's treacherie:
But with a kingly sp'rit, disdaining those
That traytors were, this treason did disclose:
    Seldome base treacherie it selfe can seat
    On the high pitch of kingly bred conceat.

37.
Philip disgrac'd, did launch into the deepe,
Being bound for Acon that besieged towne,
Where leauing him, thy muse her course must keepe
Vnto that land, whose name did first renowne
The queene of loue, and her first altars crowne:
    Whence she may safely see how Neptune raues,
    And wrackes my ships in the Pamphilian waues.
When launcht vpon the seas my ships were seene,
From the Scicilian shore with that sweet maid,
Nauare's faire Berengaria, my new queene:
Neptune as if he did intend t'haue pray'd
On my late chosen loue, began t'inuade
  My blacke fleete's wooden walles, which he did batter
  With bounding billowes of his rough rouz'd water.

Tempestuous winds, whose swelling cheekes did draw
The louring clouds full burthened with blacke showeres,
Flew on the waues, which breaking with the flaw,
Foaming white froth, did rise like loftie towers,
In roring traine, trooping vp all their powers,
  Darkness did hide the chearefull face of heau'n,
  Our ships disperst, were each from other driuen.

T'encrease our seare, and make the night more grimme,
Through heau'n's thicke clouds pale lightning still did flie,
Whose dazeling flash our mazed sight did dimme,
While the world's soueraigne in the thickned skie,
Aboue our heads did thunder horriblie,
  From whence his darts with sulphurie flash he threw,
  Which brimstone-like did sauour as it flew.

The seas did swell, and proudly braue the beau'n,
The windes did bellow and the billowes rose,
Many tall ships with gust of tempest driuen,
To saue themselves from spoilfe, all desperate bore
Vnto the hauens of the Cyprian shore,
  Upon whose strand the barbarous Cypriote stood
T'encrease their woes that did escape the flood.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

42.
Of those whose barkes did perish in the deepe,
Some hauing gain'd the shore with life halfe drown'd,
They tooke, whom as their captuies they did kepe,
And some by swimming hauing footing found,
Comming on shore with death they did confound:
    Which when I heard, the storme once blowen away,
    Such wrong with iust reuenge I did repay.

43.
The depth of danger we did vndergo
To gaine the shore, such ods there was in fight:
Yet at the last our foes their backes did show,
And left the shore to vs, but after flight
Isakius their stout king resuming sp'rit,
    Troopt vp his people, summon'd far and neare,
    And threatened fight when day light should appear.

44.
But to prevent his threats, before the day
His treasure, standard, horse and royall armes
In field we tooke, from whence he fled away
Despoil'd and naked, fearing th'horrid harms,
Which through his tents did ring with our alarmes:
    That night, whose next daie's light did promise faire
    Vnto his hopes, did end them in despaire.

45.
Heere could I tell the conquest and rich spoile,
Which for those wrongs, that we did erst sustaine,
My souldiers made on Cyprus fruitfull soile:
How false Isakius yeeding did remaine
With me in hold, and fled away againe,
    Whom after taken for his trespasse past,
    In guiues of gold I then did shackle fast.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

46.

But deeds of more import are to be told,
Thy muse must launch with vs from Cyprus shore,
That on the surging seas she may behold

Prince Salphadine's huge barke, whose bosome bore
Such furniture for warre, sent to restore
The weakened strength of Acon almost lost,
Then round besieged by the christian host.

47.

To whom like floting Delos on the wau e
We gave the chase, till turning backe from flight,
With all her fights set vp she did vs braue,
And fifteen hundred men all arm'd for fight,
Upon her deckes did shew themselves in sight,
Whom in our gallies thronging in thicke croud,
My souldiers did assaile with clamours loud.

48.

Oft times with valour the repulse they gave
To vs, that sought to board their ship and scale
Her wooden walles, so high above the wau e,
Till from our bowes, shafts thicke as winter's haile,
Their stoutest hearts with deadly wounds did quaille,
Who shrinking from the fight my men did boord,
And in their furie did not spare the sword.

49.

Then did appeare the ruine of the foe,
Gasping for breath in vaine, sweet life they craue,
The blood of wounded men did streaming flow
Into the flood, and here and there it gau e
A crimson colour to the siluer wau e:
Whereby through th'English fleet each little boat
In Pagan blood triumphantly did float.
50.

With that great monster barke two hundred men
Reseru’d from death, in triumph we did scower
The seas: to Acon’s siege begirted then
By all the christian host, from whose watch-tower
The foe-men viewing my approching power,
   And hearing of my deed upon the deepe,
No longer did intend the towne to keepe.

51.

Yet after my arrriue they being fed
With liring hope, did change their first intent,
Gainst vs the towne did proudly bear her hed:
For hearing of a priuate convoys sent,
With fresh supplie for their prouision spent,
   Though faint for food, yet they did after sheeld
Their walles with stout defence and would not yeeld.

52.

To frustrate Acon’s hopes of such supplies,
And with some high aduenture to renowne
Our English name, finding by my espies
The passage where the carriages came downe,
From Babylon to that distressed towne:
   I with a band of choice selected men,
Departed from the christian host vsenee.

53.

From vnder couert of a thicke-set groue,
On the carauan first the charge we gauce,
Three thousand burthened camels in a droue
We from the convoys tooke, who for to sanc
The rest from spoile, at first aloofe did waue,
   But when we towards them made, though more they were
In number farre, they tooke the wings of feare.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

54.
With many a thousand mule, and many a beast
Of other burthen, we return'd with speed
Vnto the christian host, where we did feast
Vpon the prey: the towne of this our deed
Inform'd by fame, and forc'd by hungrie need,
Her gates did open of her owne accord,
To save her sonnes from warre's revengeful sword.

55.
Heere must thy willing muse desist to tell
Our happie hopefull conquests in the east,
Caules brooke forth, enuie rouz'd vp from hell,
Creepes into false king Philip's cankered brest,
Who with old hate of my good hap possesse,
Doth by his plots the Austrian duke excite,
To joynce with him to worke vs all despight.

56.
As still th'infection of this soule disease,
Contagious venome in their brests did breed,
So my name's greatnesse daily did encrase,
While they on spleene were satisfied did feed,
Fortune still grac'd me with some glorious deed:
Vertue enu'l'd shines brighter, like the sun,
Which breaks through clouds, with which it was overrun.

57.
With enuious eyes, impatient to behold
The golden beames of my sun-shine like fame,
Philip with th'Austrian duke hight Leopold,
Without respect vnto our Sauiour's name,
The cause for which to Palestine we came:
Seeming heart-sicke, did thence depart away,
Hoping to leaue me to the foes for pray.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

58.
He gone, the hand of beau’n that doth dispose
The course of things, did beare before my brest
The shield of safetie gainst our Pagan foes:
With my small troope their powers in field suppresse,
The bording christian held his right in rest:
   No crosse euent while I did there abide,
   In honor’d deeds of armes did me betide.

59.
If thou desire those famous acts to know,
Mount Perseus horse, to Ioppa take thy way,
Which at this time that fatall stone can show,
To which the virgin faire Andromeda
In bands was bound, to be the monster’s pray:
   There on that rocke thy muse may sit and see
   Those deeds of fame, that then were done by mee.

60.
Assur can speake my praise, before whose wall
Great Saladine with all his heathnish host,
In battell did beneath mine ensignes fall,
Who in my passage seeking to haue crost
My way to Ioppa, on that salt sea cost,
   Fought from noone-tide vntill the setting sun,
   And then did flie, the field we christians won.

61.
In fortie yeares before the Saracen
Such losse did not sustaine in Palestine,
Nor in one battell lost so many men:
The towring state of mightie Saladine
In this fight shakken, daily did decline:
   That ancient kingdom of the Syrian land
   Did fall from him, and was at our command.

vol. ii.  4 T
Richard Cœur de Lion.

62.
From wel-wall'd Ascalon, that ancient towne
The Pagans fled with all their golden good,
Darus did stoope her pride, Assur came downe
Upon her knees, Ioppa the port that stood
Upon the Syrian shore, before the flood
With generall deluge did the world orespond,
Did beare the christian badge upon her head.

63.
To follow fortune brauely marching on,
Who with auspicious looke did seeme to smile,
We did direct our course to Babylon:
But she false ladie did my hopes beguile,
And forc'd me with mine armie to recoyle:

Fame ouer seas on her vnluckie wing
Sad tidings from the west to vs did bring.

64.
Backe, backe to England, with a grieved heart,
Leauing these blest affaires of th'holie one
Of Israel, we must with griefe depart:
Philip my foe excites my brother John
In my long absence to aspire the throne:

My England's rockie bounds ring with alarmes
Of factious traytors, John is vp in armes.

65.
Warn'd by report, my course I did direct
For England's bounds: but heere thy muse must know
My father's curse began to take effect:
Heau'n seem'd to frowne, the sea became my foe,
And earth conspir'd to worke my greater woe:

By sea's darke waues and froward winds from heau'n
Vnto my foes at shore I vp was giuen.
By tempest driven, from danger to be free,
I made hard shipwrecke on the Istriane strand,
Depriu’d of all my traine, excepting three,
Enforce’d I was to make my way by land
Through Austria, to Vienna, that doth stand
Upon Danubius bankes, that dukedoms seat,
The bulwarke now against Turkish Mahumet.

There being descri’d vnto mine ancient foe
The Austrian duke I was given vp for pray:
Who like himselfe, himselfe to me did show,
Bearing in mind the malice of that day,
When I at Acon, for his proud assay
In taking for his lodging in the towne
The palace vp, I cast his ensignes downe.

Yet with this duke not long was my abode:
For when report of my captiuitie
Was newly set on wing, and flowed abroad,
Henrie then emperour of Germanie,
Forgetful of emperiall royaltie,
Of that false duke that had me fast in hold,
Greedie of prey, did purchase me for gold.

Upon that man, whom fortune doth begin
To leave forlorn, who will not seeme to frowne?
When he is sunken vp vnto the chin
In waues of sad distresse, all thrust him downe,
And suffer him in wretchednesse to drowne:
They that did enuie my great state before,
Did wish such state might here betide me more.
Ambitious John, and Philip that false king,
Taking the time to perfect their intent,
To Henrie did a golden message wing,
In hope if he to set me free was bent,
Such purpose with corruption to prevent:
    Which when with terror stricken I did hear,
    No hope I had, no comfort did appear.

Ignoble age, branded with this foul crime,
This blemish thou canst never wipe away:
When true record shall tell to future time,
How most unjust the Christian did repay
His backe returne, that did through death assay,
    Gainst paganisme t'advance the christian name,
    Even children shall upbraid thee with the same.

In tempest of this trouble long being tossed,
Sore griev'd in mind for my captivitie,
At length compounding with my greedy host
Th'empyreous Henrie, hight of Germanie,
With ransome to redeem my libertie:
    An hundred thousand pounds I did agree
    To give to him before I could be free.

Now is my journey set on foot againe
For my deare England: now false Philip storms,
Now John repents, and feare doth him constraine,
In peace to lay downe his rebellious armes,
And by our mother seek to shun those harms
    Approaching on: t'whom I in reverence
    Of her estate, gave pardon for his offence.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

74.
In England safe arriu'd, the people greet
My glad returne with bright bone-fires and bels,
My royall London in each seuerall street,
By her large gifts and golden glorie tels
Within her walles what faithfull subiects dwels:
And I, in hope that beau'n would blesse my reigne
With better fortunes, crown'd my selfe againe.

75.
But on the swift wings of reuenge for France,
Hasten thy muse to Vernuile that strong towne,
There see French Philip fle before my lance,
And at Vandsome bow his armes cast downe,
He flies, and leaues vs treasure and renowne:
Of which two flights, this age doth since that time
To his disgrace record a shamefull rime.

76.
Disgrac'd, he cals the Britons to his aide,
With their yong Arthur sonne of Gefferie
My brother dead, for which with wrathfull blade
I entred his rich dukedom Britanie,
And vengeance tooke for his disloyaltie:
Whence, when my wreake was past, I did advancement
With ensignes spread into the bounds of France:

77.
Where beau'n did blesse me with such fate in fight,
That Philip in each field I did repelle:
Let Gamages and Vernon speake his flight,
And at another time let Gysors tell,
How flying from Curseile's, with his horse he fell
Into the waues of Geth, the bridge brake downe,
Whom mongst his men the streame did almost drowne.
Repulst with shame, he casting in his mind,
With rags of honor, how to patch the rent
In his wide wounded name, this shift did find:
Out of the greatness of his mind he sent
This challenge bold: if I durst give consent,
That five for him in field should hazard life,
Against five men of mine to end our strife.

To this bold offer I did gladly yield,
Yet interposing this condition,
That he as chiefest champion in the field,
Should amongst the five upon his part make one,
Gainst me on th'adverse part to fight alone:
From which, without respect unto a name,
Mongst men renown'd he did reuolt with shame.

Yet was a truce concluded twixt us both,
To which with willing minde I did encline,
For that I then had bound my selfe by oath
Once more to shape my course for Palestine,
T'employ my valour gainst great Saladine:
But what I did decree, death soone preuents,
Heau'n bears the chiefest stroke in our intents.

Thy muse must now put on a mourning weed,
Death doth begin to shew his ghastly face,
With sad teares mourner-like let her proceed,
To Chalus Cheuerell that fatall place,
Where death with his cold armes did me embrace:
There let her stand, and on that towne's strong wall
Behold the manner of my haplesse fall.
Richard Cœur de Lion.

82.

My treasure spent by my long warres with France,
And gainst the Pagan for the east parts bound,
I was inform'd that in my land by chance
A British vicount, Widdomer, had found
A wealthie treasure hidden vnder ground:
For whom when I had sent, he guiltie fled
To Chalus Cheuerell to hide his hed:

83.

Whom I did follow, hastned on by fate,
And did besiege the towne, where in mine ire
For such indignite against my state,
I made my vowes thence neuer to retire,
Vntill I should obtaine my iust desire:
Three daies with fierce assault I did assaile,
But all in vaine, my power could not preuaile.

84.

The towne so strongly situated was,
And the stout foes imboldned by the same,
That of our powers they did little passe:
Whose stubborne pride of strength that I might tame,
I chose a captaine, Marchades by name,
To walke with me, and view that fatall towne,
Where t'vndermine her walles and cast them downe.

85.

Each step I treade doth hasten on my end,
And leads to death vnthought vpon, vnseeene:
For as with eyes infixed I did attend
The towne's foundation, loe, an arrow keene
Sent from the towne wall, wounded me betweene
The necke and shoulder with his venom'd poyn't,
Jost in the natuie closure of the ioynt.
696  Richard Cœur de Lion

86.
Deepe was the wound and full of deadly paine,
Yet did it not my mightie minde appall,
Before the towne in siege I did remaine,
Vntill her people did for mercie call,
And prostrate at my feet did humblie fall:
  Whom when the raging soouldiers in their ire
  Would haue deuour'd, I spar'd from spoile and fire.

87.
But death doth hasten my vntimely end,
The wound lookes blacke, the poison doth appeare
In his effects, and bids me to commend
My soule to God: my friends who held me deare,
All round about me stand with heauie cheare:
  And when I knew that breath began to vade,
  I call'd for him that had my life betray'd.

88.
Vnto the man before me brought, whose name
Bertram de Gord'an was, these words I spake,
"What iust offence," quoth I, "did cause thee aime
At my deare life? or wherefore didst thou take
Me for thy marke, and in thy aime forsake
  Hight Marchades, my friend, that by me stood,
  When thou didst shoot thy shaft to shed my blood?"

89.
The man with courage turn'd this stout replie:
"Because," said he, "thou in thy warres didst kill
My father and my brethen, therefore I
Did vow in my reuenge thy blood to spill:
Which since I haue attain'd and haue my will,
  What do I care though all thy friends do weepe,
  Seeing that mine shall not vnureuenged sleepe?"
Richard Cœur de Lion.

90.
I did admire that his sterne words were such,
And yet forgaue his fact, and gaue command
That none amongst my friends with violent touch
On him should after lay offensive hand:
And that he might not in their danger stand,
I gaue him twentie crownes to beare him thence,
From those that seem’d to threaten his offence.

91.
Thus with my chiefest foe my peace I made,
And when I sensiblie felt nature’s waste,
To friends about me such like words I said:
Quoth I: “Come neere, and since all hope is past
Of longer life, whose line long cannot last,
Attend my words, and witnesse after death,
What in my will I to the world bequeath.”

92.
To John my brother I resigne my crowne:
Arthur is French and rebell to the state:
Seeke not with wilfull hands to hasten downe
What I haue built by future time’s debate:
Factions will grow, and I foresee the fate,
The wofull fate that England will betide
When I am gone, that did enrich her pride.

93.
Not long thy king, deare England, can I be,
Death’s cold begins into my heart to creepe,
No more thy fame can be advanc’d by me:
To John the prince I tender thee to keepe,
When I with death haue laid me downe to sleepe:”
Thus death when I ten yeares had been a king,
Tvntimely end my life and reigne did bring.

Vol. 11.
94.

My deeds I did atchieue with much vnrest,
Death with blacke period did my deare life close,
In prime of age approuing heau'n's behest,
Which seldome doth allot long life to those
That to their parents prove rebellious foes:

Of which that I may testimony giue,

Let Cœur de Lion in remembrance liue.
THE UNFORTUNATE

Life and Death of King John.

THE ARGUMENT.

"This prince to future time," quoth Memorie,
"Remaines a Mirrour of true charitie,
Who at his death that traytour did forgie,
Whose bloodie hand did him of life depryue:
But Marchades for vengeance did suruie,
The traytour taken he did flye aliuie:
Now to the next, whom vp from graue we bring,
Prince John the brother of the late dead king:
He takes the crowne as due to him of gift,
At whose good fortunes many hands do lift:
Philip beyond the seas inuades his lands:
Arthur in Aniou with his British bands,
Pursues the aged mother of the king,
Who to the rescue all his powers doth bring:
Takes Arthur captiue, and for his disdaine
Sends him to Rouen castle, whence againe
He there returnes: wonders in heau’n are seene,
Treason amongst the peeres, the wrathfull spleene
Twixt Rome’s proud Innocent and stout king John:
The French afresh inuade, the king finds none
To take his part: the Irish do rebell:
The Welch breake forth, both whom he doth compell
To stoope their pride: the curse of Innocent,
Against whose pride the king stands stiffely bent:
John.

Philip's huge nauie doth on England frowne,
The king vnto the legate yeelds his crowne:
The lords rebell, the king is left forlorne,
Abus'd, revil'd, and made his people's scorn:
Seekes th'aid of strangers, and in his fierce ire,
Flies oer the kingdom like a flaming fire:
The barons flie from him, and seeke to bring
The French prince Lewis in, to make him king:
He lands in Kent, London receiues his traine,
From th'haplesse king all fale away againe:
The French men's pride the English sore opprest,
King John's reuenge, poore England's woes encreas:
In midst of hope t'expell his enemies,
The wretched king at Swynsted poysoned dies:
All which, since many writers in his daies,
Of very malice writ in his dispraise,
That we may heare, let fame with summons call
His princely ghost, to tell his tragicke fall."

ANOTHER ARGUMENT.

Fame calls king John: his grieued ghost doth wake,
Comes vp from graue, and heere his turne doth take.
John.

1.
Discord the daughter of dissension,
Home-hel-hatcht furie with bewitching charmes,
Doth sooner ruine Caesar’s royall throne,
Then all the imminent inuading harmses,
That can inferred be by forren armes:
   Where people hate, and where the prince doth frowne,
   What might builds vp, dissension soone pulis downe.

2.
Of which I once that sway’d this scepter state,
Vniustly wrong’d by peeres, vkindly sold
To wretched fortune by my subiects hate,
A Mirror might have been in lines of gold,
If to this age my storie truth had told:
   But th’vkind age presents to judgement’s eye
   My shame at large, but lets my praise go by.

3.
To whom shall I my many wrongs compleaine?
Since false traditions of those enuisous times,
Inuented by my foes, do yet remaine,
Lying to euery eye in forged rimes,
As matter for the seane objecting crimes
   Vnto my charge, which firme in censure stands,
   Though were enacted by my guittlesse hands.

4.
The long concealed grieue of discontent,
Which for such vniust scandall I sustaine,
Vp from the graue my grieved ghost hath sent,
On such sterne people iustly to complaine,
That vilifie my praise with lips prophane,
   Speaking what then the superstitious wits
   Vnto this age recorded haue in writs.
5.
Could not the enuie of that age be quell'd
With my last houre's untimely tragetie?
Could not these burning veines with poison swell'd,
Their deadly hate against me satisifie?
O no, in death their malice will not die:
For which now summon'd by the trump of fame,
I gladly come to put away such shame.

6.
My royall birth Plantagenet can show,
Stout Cœur de Lion's life declares the same,
Who was the second sonne as thou dost know,
Vnto king Henrie second of that name,
Who grew so great in wealth, in strength and fame,
His yongest sonne I was, by name hight John,
Next after Richard seated on the throne.

7.
Thy lines with spot of that disloyaltie
Against my sire, Ie not defile againe,
Nor will I tell that false conspiracie
Against my brother Richard, to obtaine
From him his life, his kingdome, and his raigne:
For he at large doth in his tragedie,
Declare the manner of my treacherie.

8.
Ambitious ayme at greatnesse in the state,
Most incident to men of mightie mind,
At first did bring me in my brother's hate:
Yet in the end such saunter I did find,
That he to me, though I so most vnkind
Did oft times secke the fall of his renowne,
Forgaue my fact, and gaue to me his crowne.
John.

9.

With free consent of all this kingdom's peers,
Aduan'c'd I was to all the royalties
Of my late brother dead, and thrice three yeeres
Inthron'd I was, before my hapless eies
Were made beholders of those miseries,
Which in deep waues of woe did England drowne,
And brought confusion to my state and crowne.

10.

In my first rise vnto the kingdom's state,
False France did frowne, and stirred vp the fire
Conceal'd in ashes of our ancient hate,
The yong duke Arthur, as he did require,
Gains't vs rebell'd, and did with him conspire:
Both stretching forth their enuious hands, to crop
My new grownen greene vpon our cedar's top.

11.

On the swift whirlewinde of tempestuous warre,
Into Touraine and Aniou th'vtmost bound
Of this our empire, then inlarg't so farre,
They furiously did breake, where what they found
In my defence, they laid it waste on ground:
Of which the duke proclaim'd himselfe the lord,
And sought t'obtaine it by the threatfull sword.

12.

Warre's fearefull earthquake shaking more and more,
The state of Aniou, I did vnderstand,
How th'agrd queene my mother Elinor,
Besieged was by Arthur with strong hand,
Within a tower, which on that coast did stand:
Who sore opprest, and in her mind dismai'd,
In such distresse did call me to her aid.
Incens'd to heare my nephewe's vnhind deed
Gainst her now in her age, that gaue him breath:
As dutie bound me, on the wings of speed
I hastned to the rescue, to vnsheath
My angrie sword, whose edge did threaten death:
    A filiall loue to rescue her from harms,
    Both day and night did make me march in armes.

Before the foes of my approch did heare,
Such expedition thither I did make,
That at their backes my ensignes did appeare:
At which dismay'd, their siege they did forsake,
And most did vnto flight themselves betake:
    Of whom were many slaine that stood in fight,
    Arthur vn hurt was taken in his flight.

T'whom brought captiu'd before me, thus I spake:
"Cosin," quoth I, "what madnesse was that same,
That moued you these warres to vndertake?
Why do you thus your royall friends defame,
In bearing armes in false king Philip's name?
    Preferre you him in your esteeme more deare,
    Then me, that am to you in blood so neare?

For shame that French man's company forsake,
Let not his counsell tempt you any more:
Turne vnto me, so shall I euer take
Your cause as mine, and you againe restore
Vnto my wonted favour as before;"
    With gentle speech thus did I him entreat:
    But thus he made replie with many a threat.
"Tyrant," said he, "thou dost detaine my right,
I am, thou knowest, true heire to England's crowne:
Though vniust fortune in this lucklesse fight
Looke blithe on thee, and on my state do frowne,
Heau'n may again advance what now is downe:
   My friends be free, though I in bands be bound,
   That will not rest vntill thou be vnclown'd."

The arrogant deliuerie of this speech,
Vnto th'impeachment of our royall right,
Did in our former loue make such a breach,
That with contracted brow for such despight,
We did in rage command him from our sight,
   And did this cruell paine on him impose,
   That he for such offence his eyes should lose.

But when such readie instruments of ill,
Who for reward act any villanie,
To Rouen castle came t'effect my will:
Hubert de Bourgh a man of valiancie,
That then bad Arthur in his custodie,
   Withstood their purpose, and his part did take,
   Saying, that I those words in furie spake.

The heate of anger cool'd, conscience began
In th'eare to whisper how I had offended,
And when I heard how Hubert valiant man,
Prevented had what I in rage intended,
As reason would, his courage I commended:
   Yet after this by Arthur's haplesse woes,
   I did incurre the scandall of my foes.
21.
Close kept in Rouen castle by that knight,
Whose wals his steps from starting thence did bound,
Casting in mind how to escape by flight,
At last unfortunate a way he found
To clime the wall, that did begirt him round:
     A forward mind impatient to sustaine,
     The losse of freedome did procure his baine.

22.
Haste prickt him forward to redeeme the time,
Greedy desire his freedome to regaine,
Aboue the castle walles did cause him clime:
From whence as envious fate did first ordaine,
He downe did fall into the riuer Seyne:
     Whose waves against that castle walles did swell,
     Where to the world hc breath'd his last farewell.

23.
He dead, vnto my charge false Philip laid
That in his blood I had imbru'd my hands,
And in reuenge thereof did craue the aid
Of many princes, who with warlike bands
Did in their rage depopulate my lands:
     T'whose distresse with aid I could not come,
     Worse fortunes did befall me heere at home.

24.
Mischief on mischiefe fals t'encresce my woes,
At home my faithlesse barons do rebell,
The Irish rise, the Welch turn'd treacherous foes,
And enuiet, lest this monster I should quell
Of many heads, her selfe comes vp from hell,
     And stirres vp Rome to ioyne her hands with hate:
     No king did fall beneath so hard a fate.
John.

25.
The heau'ns foretold such things before their time,
Before my haplesse hand that cup did take,
In whose blacke deadly wine my death did swim,
Th'whole aggregate of heau'n did seeme to shake,
Sad signes on earth my tragicke fall foespake:
Seldom such fatall deeds of death are done,
But prodigies do their euent forerun.

26.
Before the founder of that famous tower,
Which overloukes our Thames' siluer cleare,
Did in the senate meet his liue's late hower,
Horrid ostents and accents full of feare,
To many Roman eyes did oft appeare,
The graues did open, and the dead did rise,
Filling the streets with lamentable cries.

27.
Before stout Brutus that proud Roman lord,
Whose bloodie hand strooke nightie Caesar dead,
With fatall blade his owne deare bodie gor'd,
Strange apparitions, full of feare and dread
Foretold his heart blood should ere long be shed:
Dead Caesar's ghost spake to him in his tent,
The night before his tragicke death's euent.

28.
Before proud Commodus that Roman king,
With violent poysne did the combate trie,
Heau'n many wonders vnto light did bring,
And many dreadfull meteors blas'd in skie,
Flames of bright fire out of the earth did flye,
Before he tooke that fatall cup of wine
Of faithlesse Martia, his false concubine.
Before those mischiefes then were set abroch,
Which did infect the peace of my estate,
Before that luckesse houre did then approch,
In which that desperate villan did await
With deadly wassaile to abridge my fate:
Heau'n did behold the earth with heauie cheare,
And plaguefull meteors did in both appeare.

Five moones were in heau'n's conscaie nightly scene,
As if that heau'n vpon our state below,
Foreseeing our harms compassionate had been,
And had foresent them with their shine to show
To purblind England her approching woe:
Who not being warn'd by them of future harms,
Was after wakened by tempestuous stormes.

The earthquake-making God, to warne vs all,
With violent hand shooke earth's foundation,
And from his thickned clouds in stormes let fall
Such showers of ycie bals, that vnto none
In former times the like had ere been knowne:
For evry hailestone of such thicknesse was,
That it in compasse did foure inches passe.

Fire making rupture through the earth did break
And burned many a towne and steeple high,
Ghosts in high-waies were often heard to speake,
And spirits in shapes of birds in darksome skie,
With fire in their beakes about did fie:
Wherewith they did afflict much scathe and woe
Vpon the countrie, flying to and fro.
John.

39.
O stubborn England, that with such foresigne
From future euill couldst not warned bee:
When heau’n and earth destruction did diuine,
For thy rebellious sinne to fall on thee,
Why didst thou close thy eyes and would’st not see?
When God did thunder judgement in thine eare,
Why wert thou deafe, as if thou would’st not heare?

34.
For pitie reade thy ruine, drawing nigh,
Upon the crystall battlements of heauen,
Where grau’d in golden letters to each eie,
Thou maiest behold thy wretched kingdom giuen
Into a stranger’s hand: thy sad king driuen
To flye from thee forlorne and leaue his state,
Sold to misfortune by his subjectes hate.

35.
Let time’s blacke hand blot out the memorie
Of that vile age, and let it not be said
That John did euer guide this emperie,
That future time with shame may not vpbraide
This nation’s name, by whom I was betraide,
And say that subjectes yet did neuer bring
Such grievous wrongs vpon a wretched king.

36.
To guide thy muse, that she the cause may know
Whence first these euills in the state did spring,
To blood-built Rome, our Albion’s ancient foe,
Nurse of all factions, let her take swift wing,
That when this wofull storie she shall sing,
She truly may define the Roman hate,
Which first did brooch these mischieues in our state.
When as our England's metropolitan
Leaving his life, had left at emptie chaire,
I did elect a right religious man,
Who with the best might in those daies compare,
For habitude to manage that affaire:
   In whose behalf at Rome I did entreate,
   That he might be installed in that seate.

Great Rome then in the ruffe of all her pride,
Deiects my suite with proud contempt; and chose
Langton, a man vnfit that place to guide,
On which such trust in state we did repose,
Since he was nurat in France amongst our foes:
   And might in time, bearing such rule in state,
   Vnto my fortunes worke vulluckie fate.

For this with Rome's proud priest thus I contend,
"Thinke not," said I, "that I that right will yeeld,
On which my royaltie doth sole depend,
The same in spight of hate I trust to shield,
While I shall liue this scepter's state to wield:
   No power on earth in my despight shall place
   A stranger in my realme to my disgrace.

If my decreed election may not stand,
I vow by heau'n, henceforth I will restraine
Those passages to Rome out of this land,
Which you hereafter will repent in vaine,
Since by the same you have no little gaine:
   For what need we to Rome a gadding go,
   Since many learned men this land can show?"
John.

41.
Hence grew the hate that after did ensue,
Heaping on wrongs upon my grieved head:
Rome's Innocent when he these lines did view,
Kindled with wrath, on raging furie fed,
Which through his breast a deadly venom spred:
Whose breath did soone infect our subjects blood,
And bred a plague vnto the generall good.

42.
Thinking it shame to his pomptickes state,
To winke at my contempt of his command,
With lips prophane, big swolne with eager hate,
He breaths his curse against me, and against my land,
To last so long as I his will withstand:
And lockes vp all church gates by his great word,
Forbidding vs access vnto the Lord.

43.
Thou proud usurper of our Peter's key,
Behold thy sinne, and blush at thy foule shame,
Why didst thou Locke the gate that leads the way
Vnto the holy place? why didst thou name
Thy selfe the rocke on whom that power that came
To saue the world, his sacred church should found,
And yet didst cast it then vnto the ground?

44.
My people frightned with the roaring threat
Of wrathful bulles to England daily sent,
Their due alleegance to their lord forget:
Th'inglorious peers, as if the government
Had been transferr'd from John to Innocent,
Did shriyne from me, and would not by me stand,
For th'impeach t priuilege of our free land.
Yet could all this not stoope my noble hart,
The rebell priests, that did at his command
Pronounce his curse prophane, did feele the smart
Of their offence, and from my furions hand
T'scape my vow'd reuenge, did flie the land,
Leauing their sweet possessions for a pray,
Which to my friends I freely gane away.

After this curse it seem'd my bliss begun:
For when the stubborn Irish did rebell,
Meth witnesse be of my atchieuements done:
And let cold Snowden's barren mountaines tell,
How the rebellious Welch my hand did quell:
No wofull fate befell me at this season,
Till my false peeres began to practise treason.

Infected with this curse, and having lost
My wonted loue, they did with home consent:
For as to Wales I marched with my host,
The Scottish king their malice to preuent,
Did send me letters of their whole intent,
How they were bent, if I did forward goe,
To kill me, or betray me to my foe.

Perplexed in mind, thenceforth I stood in feare
Of ruine threatened to my life and state:
France did oppresse me, and the Welch did bear
Rebellious armes: but such was my hard fate,
None could oppose them through my barons hate:
Yet I, on whom mine owne no mercie haue,
In their distresse to strangers comfort gaue.
John.

49.
To me with care oppress, the Scotch king
Letters did send full fraught with lines of woe,
Which unto me his sonne the prince did bring,
By which he moverd me, though once my foe,
On his oppressd age remorse to show:
For his base subiects against him did arise,
And for his age his person did despise.

50.
A mightie host with speed I did prepare,
With which enrag'd, I into Scotland went,
Where, in that warre my sword but few did spare,
That against their aged king their powers had bent,
To take from his crowne and government:
Guthred mac William cause of all this strife,
Did with a traytor's death shut vp his life.

51.
But let vs turne vs backe from Scotland's bounds,
At home to view the effects of Roman hate:
There see how Innocent inflicts fresh wounds
Upon the mangled bodie of our state,
Who since that no old mischiefe could abate
The spirit invincible of my great mind,
To make me stoope, new mischieves now did find.

52.
By power of his usurpt authoritie,
He did absolve all subiects in my land,
That by alleageance were oblig'd to me:
Then would he put into king Philip's hand,
The crowne and royall scepter of this land:
If he from hence could me expell by might,
Or take my life away by treacherous slighth.

John.

53.
Thou that dost ride upon the backes of kings,
Yet seest to walke the steps of our deare Lord,
Thou that dost make a cloake of holy things,
To hide thy shame, and leau'st the sacred word,
To oppose the Lord's anointed with the sword:
Is this the path that th'Holy One did passe?
When he to Caesar gave, what Caesar's was.

54.
How canst thou wash thy hands of these foule crimes,
When thou didst make this kingdom's crowne my shame:
Let not posteritie in future times,
Impute this fact to England's John for blame,
That Rome did force him stoope to such denile:
Since mine owne friends with all the world did frowne,
Before proud Rome could cause me yeeld my crowne.

55.
See on the seas where France her way doth take,
To plucke me from my throne by force of hand:
See how my faithlesse barons me forsake,
And rather readie be themselues to band
Against their prince, then in his quarrell stand:
Yea see my houshold folke do me forgoe,
And lift vp rebell hands to helpe my foe.

56.
The stiffe-neckt priests the subject to excite
Against his king, a prophet did procure,
Who by the skill of his prophetick sight,
Of peace to come the people should assure,
And that as king I should not long endure:
To which th'vunconstant people credit gaue,
Whose minds in state do alterations craue.
57.
In this distresse, in vaine I striue to stand
Against th'approching shame which I lament,
Besieged round with feare on euery hand,
Not knowing how such mischiefe to preuent,
Pandalph the legate comes from Innocent,
   To know if yet th'effects of his proud frowne,
   Had in such dangers brought my stomack downe.

58.
O vnkind England now behold and see
Thy wronged king forlorne, and forc'd by feare
To yeeld his crowne vpon his bended knee:
O deepe disgrace, that any prince can beare,
O that such pride in prelates ever were:
Pandalph in signe that I my sinnes repent,
   Receiues my crowne giu'n vp to Innocent.

59.
Remitting former faults with gratious doome,
And hauing kept my crowne for fve daies space,
As made contributorie vnto Rome,
The same againe he on my head did place,
And with my former title did me grace:
   To the French king likewise with speed he went,
   Charging him leaue his course for England bent.

60.
But he in hope the diadem to gaine,
Would not desist: but with a nauie came
Of twice foure hundred ships vpon the maine:
Whose powers t'oppose, proud Pandulph did proclame
That all men should in Innocentius name
   Lift vp their hands t'auert those threatned harms,
   Whereby the shore were stuft with men of armes.
61.
Fiue hundred saile well mann'd against the foes,
I launche into the seas with them to fight:
And for the generall of the fight I chose
My bastard brother, William Longspatth hight,
Of those our troublous times the brauest knight,
Who at this time his valiancie did show,
In this sea-fight against th'invading foe.

62.
Gainst whom they fought with such successfull hands,
That on our side the conquest did remaine:
Philip disgrac'd with his dismembred bands,
Vnto his home returned backe againe,
There to recure the losse he did sustaine:
While I in vaine do seeke to heale my state,
All rent and torne by mutinous debate.

63.
Out of the ruines of my countries woe,
What I to raise did carefull hands applie,
My rebell barons downe againe did throw:
To take advantage, while my miserie
Is yet but fresh, they me in field defie,
For that to their demands I gaue no care,
Which to mine honor prejudiciall were.

64.
By friends forlorn, they forced me by might
To yeeld to them, to my disgrace and shame:
The thought of which, and of that great despight
Done by Rome's Innocent, did so inflame
My heart with furie, that I did exclaim
Vpon my fates that did my daies prolong,
In which I was ordain'd t'indure such wrong.
65.
Of mine owne servants left all desolate,
But seuen in number did with me remaine,
Pursu’d by most disloyall people’s hate:
Oft with meane food my life I did sustaine,
Lest they by poyson should procure my bane:
   And for my safetie with those few approved,
   In strange disguise I to and fro removed.

66.
In this distresse into the Ile of Wight
My selfe in secret wise I did convey,
Where while I did remaine, in my despight
Each slaeue, whose heart my name could once affray,
With barbarous taunts vpon the same did play:
   Some call’d me fisherman, some rouing thiefe,
   That fled the land, at seas to find relieve.

67.
Such wrongs with patience I did seeme to beare,
Dissembling wrath in my reuengefull mind,
To such reports I seem’d to giue no care:
But still did lie, as vnto peace inclin’d,
Till I hit opportunitie did find:
   For in the end when I return’d againe,
   For such contempt they paid me double paine.

68.
Receiving aid from friends beyond the seas,
Like to a tempest stooping downe from heau’n,
With spoilefull hands my kingdome I did sease,
All in my furies were to slaughter gien,
My barons into flight with terror druuen:
   Fled from my face, and sought their heads to hide
   For their misdeeds, in field none durst abide.
Iohn.

69.
They all vnable to withstand my might,
Not with submission milde did mercie craue:
To do to me and mine the more despight,
To France they sent, desiring for to haue
Prince Lewis to their king, to whom they gaue
Their promise to advance him to the crowne,
And as a tyrant king to cast me downe.

70.
King Philip fostring malice in his mind,
And gainst me such aduantage hauing found,
Though no pretence of title he could find,
Whereon his purpos'd enterprise to ground:
Yet strecht he out his arme our state to wound,
    And take from me and my posteritie,
    Our diadem and kingly royaltie.

71.
For his proud sonne prince Lewis he did send,
With many a troope and many a warlike band,
Whose wisht accessse my barons did attend,
With all their troopes vpon the Kentish strand,
Where with his host French Lewis first tooke land:
    Whence with those traytors he to London went,
    Which in this treason did with them consent.

72.
Then did begin my former miserie,
For those, in whom chiefe trust I did repose,
Those stranger souldiers all from me did fli,
Except some few, that did lament my woes,
And Douer castle kept against my foes,
    Ynto whose trust I did the same betake,
    All other seeming friends did me forsake.
John.

73.

But see the judgement of almightie Ioue,
On the disloyall people of this land:
The conquering French, whose nature is to proue,
Insulting over whom they beare command,
Now being lords of all, with heauie hand
    The English people did begin to oppresse,
    Who could not helpe themselves in this distresse.

74.

Thus did the King of heau’n iust vengeance take
On them, for their vniust disloyaltie:
My part he did not utterly forsake,
But in the end did force my foes to flie,
And leane the crowne to my posteritie:
    For he did chuse out one amongst the foe,
    To be our enemie’s chiefe overthrow.

75.

There was a noble minded man of France,
Vicount of Melum, and a Frenchman borne,
Who falling sicke did waile the sad mischance
Of th’English, iustly made false fortune’s scorne,
That thus had left their king to liue forlorne:
    Yea with remorse his conscience it did sting,
    To see the subiect so oppresse the king.

76.

When death in him began his due to take,
He for my nobles secretly did send,
To whom with fainting voice these words he spake:
    “My friends,” quoth he, “unto my words attend,
Which shall ere long for evermore have end:
    Attend, I say, conscience bids me impart
    The things that now lie heauie on my hart.”
720

John.

77.
Woe to the wretched people of this land,
Which do their soueraigne lord and king forsake:
Woe to your selues, that for your king should stand,
Of whom a scorne vnto the world ye make:
And woe vnto your children for your sake:
Yea, woe to England euermore shall be,
Vnlesse with speed ye seeke some remedie.

78.
Lewis our prince of late hath deeply sworne,
And with him sixteene earles and barons more,
That ye, that now haue left your king forlorne,
Shall die the death, or else exil'd deplore
Your case in forren parts for euermore:
Then let each peere with speed draw forth his sword,
To helpe himselfe and his distrressed lord.

79.
If conscience cause me to bemeone the chance
Of this so braue a king, which ye possesse,
To whom I am a stranger borne in France:
Yea once his foe, though now as ye may gesse,
I as a friend bewaile his sad distresse:
How then should ye that are his liegemen borne,
For this his sad mishap with sorrow mourne?

80.
Assist him then as dutie doth you bind,
Pitie your selues and your posteritie:
And keepe what I haue spoken in your mind,
Of which no more to you I can descrie:
For now my heart doth faile and I must die:
Adieu pourtant, Adieu à chacun amy.
Adieu ie dis ma vie ce fini."
John.

81.
My peers forewarned of such treacherie,
And with remorse viewing their native lands
Betrail'd to spoile by their disloyaltie,
Did cast in mind how they with helping hands
Might best restore themselves from captive bands:
And hoping now my grace againe to win,
From Lewis to decline they did begin.

82.
Upon th'insulting French to powre my spleene,
Throughout my kingdom's bounds I did proclaime,
That all my subjects that had wronged been
By forren foes, if unto me they came
With minds for fight, I would reuenge the same:
Whereby with speed came many a worthie wight
Under my standard gainst the French to fight.

83.
Like raging storme blowne out of Boreas mouth,
With violent furie I did force my way,
From east to west, from north unto the south
Destroying all things, that before vs lay:
Which did our adversaries so dismay,
That none durst stand t'oppose vs in the field,
But readie way unto our will did yeeld.

84.
Had proud prince Lewis met with me in fight,
Our quarrell by the dint of sword to trie,
Soone should I haue obtain'd my kingdom's right,
And made th'usurping prince from hence to flye,
Who did support my peere's disloyaltie:
But treason stretched out her deadly hand,
Who twixt the French and my reuenge did stand.
In Swinsted abbie witnesse of my wrong,
A monke there was, the worker of my bane,
Who heard me vow that if I liued long,
Through England I would raise the price of graine,
To plague my subiects for their proud disdaine:
  Which was the cause, as fates did first decree,
  For which this villan monke did poyson mee.

To vent the poisened thoughts of his false brest,
Loe all alone in dead time of the night,
When euer one had laid him downe to rest,
When aire was husht, when from the welkin bright
The golden stars did cast a glimmering light,
  He forth did walke into a garden by,
  For to effect his wicked treacherie.

There as this villan wandred to and fro,
To find some weed that had the power t'expell
The vitall spirit, or any aduerse foe
To humane life, some kind of serpent fell,
Or any thing that did with poyson swell:
  At last an vglie toad he haplesse found,
  Big swolne with poyson crawling on the ground:

With which full glad he did returne againe,
And to his chamber secretly did goe,
Where with his pen-knife he did pricke and paine
The lothsome toade, from whom the blood did floe,
By which the wicked monke did worke my woe:
  For poison which the toade did vomit vp,
  With wine he mixed in a fatall cup.
John.

89.

With which to me he came, and thus he spake,
"My liege," said he, "a cup of wine I bring,
Of which if that your grace a taste will take,
It will abate the edge of sorrow's sting,
Which deeply seems to wound my grieved king:
With it to England's health I will begin,
Whose woes for evermore be drown'd herein."

90.

Thus did this villain drink, and drank his last,
And after unto me the cup he gave,
Of which misleeming nought, I straight did taste,
Which done, not all the world my life could save,
So deadly was it tempered by the slave:
The effects whereof before my death were known,
Which came to passe immediatly thereon.

91.

For when the raging venom had disspread
It selfe throughout my bodie by the veins,
My blood did boile, my heart began to dread,
My bodie swell'd, and when no hope remains
Of any helpe to remedie such pains:
I for the monke did call to haue his head,
But one did answere make, that he was dead.

92.

"Then God," quoth I, "haue mercie on my soule,
For of this wretched world no man am I,
Seeing nothing may this venom's force controule:
For sensible I feele how it doth lie
Upon my woeful heart, and I must die:
Wherefore my sonne fetch bither vnto mee,
That I before I die his face may see."
The child being brought, for then he was a child,
To him I thus did speake with weeping eie:
"My sonne," quoth I, "on whom my hopes I build:
Come neere to me, where heere in paine I lie,
Come neere and haue my blessing ere I die,
Nought else to thee is left for me to leave,
Since of my crowne my foes do me bereave.

Wherefore ye heau'ns who do behold my woes,
Now at my death give care vnto my prayer,
Protect this child of mine from all his foes:
And for your mercie's sake this infant spare,
Whose tender age doth want your tender care:
Else will that roring lion Lewis kill
This little lambe, though he hath done none ill.

And thou, my litle sonne, take heed by me,
That thou thy peers and people's loue procure,
Content not thou with thy nobilitie:
So shall thy state and kingdom long endure,
And thou from forren foes liue safe and sure:
For my false subiects undeserved hate
Did worke my woe, which I repent too late.

Renowned Pembroke, thou hast left my foe,
Be thou protector to this pretie boy,
And for the father's sake thy favouour show:
When I am gone do thou thy strength employ
Against all those that seeke this child's annoy:
And ye, my other peers, who once haue ben
My foes, proue now true hearted noble men.
Redeeme your countrey from that captiue woe,
Which from the roote of ciuill discord grew:
Ioyne hearts and hands against the common foe:
Forget old wrongs, vnto the prince proue true:
Farewell, my daies be done, I die, adew.”
Thus after twice nine yeares of rule in state,
I lost both life and rule by timelesse fate.

Behold the last effects of Henrie’s curse
On his last sonne, for his rebellious pride:
Let princes learne, that where debate, the nurce
Of discord, doth the prince and peeres diuide,
Nought but destruction can that state betide:
Of which let that sad time of my short reigne,
A Mirrour vnto future time remaine.
THE WOFVLL LIFE AND

Death of King Edward the second.

THE ARGUMENT.

"Writers," quoth Memorie, "were much to blame
Of John, that noble prince, to speake such shame:
But little credit vnto them we giue,
Since they were foes to him, when he did liue:
His first sonne Henrie, third of that same name,
Did him succeed, and with his sword did tame
That French prince Lewis, whom he forced by might
To leaue this kingdome, due to him of right:
Edward his sonne, the first that bore that name
Since William's conquest made, whose noble fame
Shall neuer die, did in the throne succeed,
And in his daies wrought many a worthie deed:
Yet neither of these princes both did feele
Th'inconstant course of fortune's froward wheele:
That Edward of Carnaruan, third from John,
Is next in course, whom we must stay vpon:
He in the first spring of his fatall raigne
Recals the banisht Gaueston againe,
Exil'd before by his renowned sire,
At whose proud taunts the peeres being set on fire,
Do quench it with his blood: the angrie king
Vowes his reuenge, the valiant Breuce doth bring
Edward the Second.

His powers into the field, and in the fight
At Banokesborne turns th'English into flight:
Heau'n, dearth, and death foretels the sad euent,
Which did ensue vpon the rier Trent:
The queene is sent to France the peace t'haue mou'd,
Prues false, returns againe with her belou'd:
Arriues in armes, against whom the king craues aid,
Who left forlorne, and at the last betrai'd,
Imprison'd, and enforc'd by parlament,
Vnto his sonne resignes the government:
On him depos'd, more mischiefe to inferre,
His queene, the bishop, and her Mortimer,
In darke enigma do conclude his death:
And, lest that he should seeme t'expire his breath
By violent hand, a torment they devise
By which the king in Bercklie castle dies:
Of which that we th'vndoubted truth may haue,
Let fame call vp his wronged ghost from graue.”

ANOTHER ARGUMENT.

Fame summons vp the king: in briefe he showes
How queene, peere-, people, all did him depose.
Edward the Second.

1.
That subtle serpent, servile flattery,
Seldome infects the meaner man, that feares
No change of state through fortune's treacherie:
She spits her poison at the mightiest peeres,
And with her charmes inchant the prince's cares:
   In sweetest wood the worme doth soonest breed,
   The caterpillar on best buds doth feed.

2.
If sly dissimulation credit winne
With any prince, that sits on highest throne,
With honied poysen of sour sugred sinne,
It causeth him turne tyrant to his owne,
And to his state workes swift confusion,
   Above his cedar's top it high doth shoot,
   And canker-like devoureth it to the root.

3.
Of which that thou a perfect Mirrour haue,
The wronged ghost of that deposed king,
Carnaruan's Edward, hath forgone his grane,
Who does with him such dolefull tidings bring,
That yet thy muse the like did never sing:
   Those sad mishaps which she before did show,
   Compar'd to mine are counterfeits of woe.

4.
To strengthen her complaint before she sing,
And drowne her grieved thoughts in depth of woe:
   (Yee murdered ghosts, that under night's black wing,
   In vncoyth paths doe wander to and fro,
   And oft in sighfull groanes your griefe do show)
   Haste vnto vs, and hauing heard our wrong,
   Help with your shricks to make a mournful song.
Edward the Second.

5.

The quill of some sad turtle's wing applie
That mourn'd so long, till griefe did strike her dead:
Blood be thy incke, which when it waxeth drie,
Moisten with teares: and when all thine are shed,
From euery eye, that haps these lines to reade,
   Let euery verse compos'd, such sad sound beare,
   That for each word it may enforce a teare.

6.

(Sorrow, distresse, and all that can be found
Which once did helpe me waile my woefull smart,
When fatall Berckly's buildings did resound
The echoing complaints of my poore hart)
Grant your accesse, and helpe to beare a part,
   That our sad muse more ruthfully may sing,
   The storie of a dead deposed king.

7.

I tell of honie-soothing parasites,
Of stubborne peeres, who louing sterne debate,
Did boldly braue me in two bloodie fights,
Of a proud prelate's plots, of people's hate,
Of the sad raine of a royall state:
   And of a queene betray'd to fond desire
   Who too too cruell did my death conspire.

8.

To the first Edward, since the Norman's name
Grew famous for their crown'd grac'd victorie,
The fourth of six of his faire sonses I am,
Mongst whom I was ordain'd by destinie,
To sway the scepter of this emperie:
   Before my kingly father left to line,
   The first three borne to death his due did giue.

vol. ii.  5 A
Edward the Second.

9.
I did survive, the youngest of the foure,
And did succeed my sire in royall chaire:
But did not tread the path which he before
Had with his vertuous foot-steps beaten faire:
Birth binds not vertue to succeed in th'heire,
   Else why did I of such illustrate race,
   Obscure his vertuous deeds with my disgrace?

10.
Had I but tracht the steps of such a sire
To perfect that great worke, which he begun,
Had princely thoughts but mounted my desire
T'assay like glorious deeds, which he had done,
O what a prize of honor had I wonne!
   But discord sent from hell did ruine bring,
   Even at that time, that I was crown'd a king.

11.
As th'holie priest with sanctified hand
The precious vnguent on my head should powre,
And as before the altar I did stand,
Discord the furie sent from that blacke shore
By damned Dis where Phlegeton doth rore,
   Shapt like th'appointed priest whose hallowed hand
   Should me annoint, by me vnknowne did stand.

12.
Approaching nigh, the venome she did shed
Of sad Coeptus poele, which she did bring
In her blacke viall, on my haplesse head,
Whose baneful sauour borne on furie's wing,
Did not alone infect th'annointed king:
   But round diffus'd, as sent from peere to peere,
   Did poysone those high bloods that present were.
Edward the Second.

13.
The ranke contagion of this foule disease
With rauing looke the mightiest in the state,
Whose desperate rage with remedie t'appease,
Warre rouz'd himselfe at home, who had of late
Slept in the bosome of pernicious hate:
   And did incite them in pretence of good,
   With their owne swords to let their bodies blood.

14.
O most remorselesse of that impious age,
That did not only then deny your aide
To your deare countrie, when with barbarous rage
The bordering foes her bosome did inuade,
And in her wombe such ghastly wounds had made,
   But as a nation borne of viper's brood,
   O shame to tell, did daily sucke her blood.

15.
Great queene of sea-siedg'd iles, what canst thou show
Of that good hap, when Edward thy late king
Did safely bulwarke thee against thy foe?
Thy Edward now doth with his minions sing,
While thou thy hands in wretchednesse dost wring:
   And Brence doth mangle thee with many a scarre,
   While thy proud peeres prepare for ciuill warre.

16.
In our discourse, that we a method haue
Of every action, let vs briefly tell
In his due place, which time and order gauie:
And that we may first know those causes well,
From whence these sad effects produc'd befell,
   In the respective scope of this our storie,
Let vs looke backe to Edward's dates of glorie.
Edward the Second.

17.
In the fresh blossom of my youthfull spring,
Sucking the sugered poison of delight,
Euen then when with strict hand the carefull king
Kept backe my youth, I on the baites did bite
Of Gaueston that soothing parasite:
A yong esquire of Gascoyne in faire feature,
Shapt like an angell: but of euill nature.

18.
My royall father, who with judgement's eie
Could sound the depth of things, perceiuing well
How follie did by him her charmes applie,
T'inchant my youth: such mischiefe to repell,
Did him exile, lest by the powerfull spell
Of his allurements drawne from all renowne,
I should be made vnworthie of a crowne.

19.
O prudent prince! the depth of that decree
Which heau'n did purpose by my Gaueston,
Too secret was for humane sense to see,
Who did ordaine, that exil'd minion
To ruine Edward and thy royall throne:
Though an exile he did then depart,
Yet with him went thy wanton Edward's heart.

20.
Too late it was that obiect to remove,
To whom in fancie's cup I long before
Had quaff'd so deepe, that surfeiting with loue,
Heart-sicke I was till time did him restore,
And set him once againe on England's shore:
Forgetfull of my faith to Edward dead,
Not to reuoke, whom he had banished.
Edward the Second.

21.

His bones were yet scarce cold, his royall throne
Scarce warme beneath me was, when in the same
I did embrace my deare, lou’d Gaueston,
Who as infected with contagious shame
Of some corrupted place, from whence he came,
   Throughout the land in little space did spread,
That foule disease which our destruction bred.

22.

In court the leprous spots of his delights
Vnto the palace wals so fast do cleaue,
That from my presence all the noblest wights
Withdraw themselves, and in their roomes do leaue
Those vp-starts base, who them of grace bereave:
   No man is held to be the king’s true friend,
   But he that doth his Gaueston commend.

23.

His lips were made the oracles, from whence
I tooke aduice, he in the counsell sits,
Graue states as enemies are banisht thence,
The shallow-brain’d yong giddie-headed wits,
Our wanton humour with best counsell fits,
   The sage instructions of the wise man’s mouth,
   Do sound harsh musike in the eares of youth.

24.

This was the spring, from whence at first did floe
Those streames of strife, which rising like a flood
Do overcome my state in waues of woe,
Which threat confusion to the common good,
Which first in death do coole my barons blood:
   And which yet swelling higher, lastly bring
A violent downefall to a royall king.
Edward the Second.

25.
My Gaueston, in maiestic's great armes
Being safely hug'd, no change of fortune feares:
He wantons with the king, soothes his owne harmes,
He playes the buffon's part, he flouts and ieers
The courtly actions of the honor'd peers:
   The great in counsell and the noble borne,
   Are made the subiect of his hatefull scorne.

26.
Sterne wrath to let loose rage, steps vp from hell,
Conducts my peeres from court vnto the campe,
She claps her hands and with a countenance fell,
Gnashing her teeth doth fiercely raue and rampe,
And with her feet vp on the ground doth stampe:
   Then whets them to reuenge in their rash mood,
   Whose furious thirst must be allaid with blood.

27.
Twice was my minion as an exile sent
To forren shores, their furie to restraine,
And twice againe reuokte with their assent,
Who now no longer able to restraine,
Prouokte with daily wrongs of his disdain,
   He being betrail'd, for vengeance all do call,
   On Gauer's heath, where Gaueston did fall.

28.
They wreake their vengeance in his reeking blood,
My sighes they laugh to scorne, while I lament,
With faire pretence to further common good
They vnderpop their cause, and to preuent
The mischief, that may grow from discontent,
   To tracke me step by step in euery thing,
   Whom they do please, they place about their king.
Edward the Second.

29.

Feeding on griefe for Gaveston deceast,
And blushing at such wrong done to my state,
Revenge doth burne in my distempered brest,
Anger takes hands with griefe, all ioyne with hate,
And to the peeres threaten pernicious fate,

Who, lest time weaken rage then too too strong,
Do give it strength by adding daily wrong.

30.

In this dissension, while on euery hand,
We for our owne destruction do prepare,
Newes from the north giues vs to vnderstand,
How valiant Browne in his successful warre
Against our powers doth prosperously fare,

Recooering that from vs againe, with more,
Which our dread sire had kept from him before.

31.

Beyond the bounds of his owne native soile,
He proudly breaks vpon our bordering coast,
None seekes t'oppose, he makes no faint recoile:
The spoile and riches of whole countries lost
Can hardly bound the furie of his host,

Neuer did bordering foe intrude so far,
Or wound our kingdom with a greater scar.

32.

Tempestuous tidings borne on Boreas breath
Cooles the hot vengeance of a wrathfull king,
And for a while delayes prepared death
For his proud peeres, feare from the north on wing
Comes flying fast, and 'bost our eares doth ring,

Bidding vs haste, and powre our vengeance forth
Upon our foes, that brau'd vs in the north.
Edward the Second.

33.
Mustering vp troopes of foot-men for the field,
To passe in person for this great affaire,
My hopes on number I do vainly build:
Our thoughts made aduerse by the former iar,
Prepare vs mischiefe in the following war:
Disioyn'd in heart, yet ioyn'd in ranke we goe,
To giue a famous conquest to the foe.

34.
Stout Brewse renounes his sword with Edward's flight,
Striuiling, whose siege our rescue cru'd, can tell
England's misfortune in that haplesse fight:
And Banokesborne, who 'boue her bounds did swell
With bodies dead, that in that battell fell,
Above the bordering brookes hath won a name
Fam'd for this field thus fought vpon the same.

35.
O noble nation, t'whom true fame hath giuen
A glorious name for deeds accomplished,
Equall with any people's vnder heau'n,
Be not dismay'd, 'twas I, 'twas I, that led
To such mishap, on whose vnhappie head
Heau'n neuer smil'd, but with sterne lookes still frown'd
Till wearied with mishaps, I was vnrown'd.

36.
O had I perisht by the sword of Brewse,
And had not been reseru'd to future daies,
To see my peers with treason take a truce,
And with their swords by all uniust assaies,
Attempt to hew downe him, whom heau'n did raise:
I had been blest, and had not liu'd to rue
The woes yet worse, which after did ensue.
Edward the Second.

37.
Th'inevitable wounds of wrong infixed so deep,
Against my barons in my swollen heart,
With drops of blood now made afresh to weep,
That I from Bremse should thus with shame depart,
Did so augment my mind's impatient smart,
That by my peers mine ire now new stirr'd vp,
I with their blood quench'd in Bellona's cup.

38.
What they do plot is by my powre controul'd,
What I intend, vnreuerently they crosse:
What they do wish, I will not: what I would,
They do gain-say, though to a publike losse:
Thus vpon mischiefe's racket do we tosse
The common good, till bandied by vs all
Into confusion's hazard it do fall.

39.
Both heau'n and earth, as if in mourning clad,
They did bewaile, what they could not prevent,
When on our selues, our selues no pittie had,
Demise those comforts in due season sent,
Which to this nation they before had lent:
As with their anger they would vs recall
From running headlong, where we needs must fall.

40.
Towards th'Articke side of heau'n ore Albion's rocks,
A blazing meteor stood in th'upper aire,
Which with grim looke shaking his dreadful locks,
Bids earth be barren, and the world despair:
Then calls the furies with the snakie haire,
To execute that vengeance to succeed,
Which fates for wretched England had decreed.
Edward the Second.

41.
Famine, forerunner to devouring death,
Haunts every coast, where food is to be found,
The fruits are blasted by her baneful breath,
She makes the clouds to drop, till that be drown'd,
Which plenteous hand had hidden in the ground:
Then doth she ransack both the rich and poor,
Denouncing all, till she can find no more.

42.
If ever move a stony cie,
Let her present our age for map of woe,
There see for food, how little infants crie,
Whom, parents wanting, what they would bestow,
With grief are either forced to forgo,
Or else with weeping woe to sit them by,
Till faint for food before their face they die.

43.
The spouse, that wants to feed her fruitful womb,
Burying the babe, that never came from grave,
Cries in her dear's dear arms, for death to come,
Who mad with sorrow and in hope to have
That left of death, which love desires to save:
A horrid thing to tell, to save his own,
Steals other's children for to feed upon.

44.
When lean-faced famine, who with furious thirst
Coasting the country, through the land had run,
Began to breath as having done their worst,
That other furie pastilence begun
To finish that, which they had left undone,
Who 'boue our heads in the infected aire,
Her poysned shafts for battle did prepare.
Edward the Second.

45.
Her angrie arrowes every way do flye,
Thousands on either hand in death do fell:
But happie they in blessed peace to die,
Not left with vs to lye, when death did call,
To see blood-thristie warre the worst of all:
That uniuersall flood of woes powre downe
In seas of blood, this wretched land to drowne.

46.
In midst of these extreames with griefe cast downe,
The measure of our miserie to fill,
My stubborne peers take armes, and proudly frowne,
Threatning in rage that little left to spill,
If basely I submit not to their will:
And exile those, whom they themselves did place
In stead of Gaueston t'attend our grace.

47.
He that in bosome of a prince doth dwell,
And by endeauour seekes to gaine his grace,
Though for his service he desere it well:
Yet as the deere pursu'd from place to place,
The envious dog will haue him still in chase:
Danger in chiepest sit仗 it doth bring,
To seeme to be familiar with a king.

48.
Spenser, the man, on whom at first I frownd,
Whom they preferr'd, my Gaueston being dead,
Was he, whom they pretend to be the ground
Of all their griefe, gainst him they now made head,
He was of vs too highly sauoured:
Him must we banish, so they thinke it fit,
If on our throne in sauety we will sit.
49.

William de Bremse in selling Gower's land
To yonger Spenser from the other peers,
Who would haue brought the same at Bremse's hand,
First blew the coles, whence now that flame appeares,
Which had been hid in anger many yeares;
This is the cause of their conceiued ire,
For this in armes against me they do conspire.

50.

Dialoyall Lancaster, that did conduct
The rebels to the field, by letters sent
With termes vnfit his soueraigne will instruct,
Assigning daies, within whose termament,
I should reforme such things in gouernment,
Which he mislikes, thus adding to that fire,
Which did at length consume him in our ire.

51.

This fire yet burning in our royall brest,
The queene doth with complaint her wrongs prefer,
That in her progress after long vnrest,
Our late false steward lord Badelismere,
Confederate with rebellious Lancaster,
Unkindly had deni'd in my despight,
Her lodging in Leeds castle for a night.

52.

To make our furie in reuenge more strong,
Letters from Scotland intercepted were,
Which touch vs neerer then all former wrong,
In number six: the one of which did beare
The armes of Douglas, sent to Lancaster,
In which the Douglas to conceale his name,
Vnto king Arthur doth direct the same.
Edward the Second.

59.
Proukt to vengeance for such treacherous spight,
From London with our royall powres we past,
Whose stomackes fill'd with furie for the fight,
I vrgeed forward with the utmost hast,
To lay the manours and the lordships wast
Of our proud barons, promising for pray
All that was theirs, that came within their way.

54.
Newes of th'vnnaturall deeds which they enact
Upon the loyall people of our land,
Hasten vs forward with such speed exact,
That ere the Mortimers, who both did band
Themselves with Lancaster, did understand
Of our approch our royall armed traine,
At Shrewsburie did front them on the plaine.

55.
Far from confederates amaz'd with wonder,
At our approch, both daunted to behold
Our frownes of lightning, and our threats of thunder,
Hang downe their heads, scarce daring be so bold
As looke on vs, their fainting hearts wax cold,
And on their knees they fall, in hope to stay
Our angrie doome, that threatned their decay.

56.
Yeelding to fate by force of destinie,
Whose forappointing prouidence hath power
In euerie thing t'enforce necessitie,
We grant them life, reserving in the tower
That Mortimer at London for that hower,
In which by destiny it was set downe,
That that false lord should ruine my renowne.
Edword the Second.

57.
Marching more northward from the Cambrian coast,
While vengefull breath the fire of furie fans,
After such good successe to bring our host
To Pomfret, which gainst vs our barons mans:
At last we lite like flockes of snow-white swans
   Fast by the weeping Eye, which runneth downe
   Into the Trent by little Caldwell's towne.

58.
There first did Needwood's echoing forrest tell
The stubborne barons of our whole intent,
There first they seeke our forces to repell,
When with their powers our passage to preuent,
Intended ore the bosome of the Trent,
   They interrupt our purpose with proud braues,
   On Burton bridge ore fishie Trent's blacke waues.

59.
The rier's watrie wombe did proudly swell,
As if it had turn'd rebell with the fogs,
Or as if louing either armie well,
It would preuent poore England of the woes
Which must ensue, if both parts came to bloses:
   Her waters rose beyond their wonted bounds,
   And for three daies deferr'd unnaturall wounds.

60.
Aquarius with the foot-bands manly fought
Gainst those, that on the bridge at Burton stood,
While with our troopes vnsene we cast about
Vnder the couert of a leauie wood,
Distant three miles from thence, where ore the flood
   Th'whole host did passe by shallowes lately found,
   To meete the barons vpon equall ground.
Edward the Second.

61.
The deadly drum doth tell the foes from far
The fatal march of their approaching king:
Who seeing their weakness to sustain the war
Gainst such a powre, which with vs we do bring,
They turn their backs, swift farse their feet doth wing:
Yet stubborn men still to provoke our ire,
Before they flee, they set the towne on fire.

62.
Horror pursues them every way they flie,
Repentance comes too late to calm our frowne,
All former wrongs afresh for vengeance crie,
They, that did while with wish them all renowne,
By aduerse fortune being thus cast downe,
Lift vp their hands, yet lower to suppress them,
All friends turne foes in pursue to distresse them.

63.
At Burrough bridge, in their vnluckie flight,
Where for th'encounter death did rendie stand,
They were enforce'd in most unequall fight,
For longe life to use defensie hand
Against the stubborn bands of Cumberland:
Led by stout Herckley, who with bold assay
Of his drawne sword began a bloody day.

64.
In mutuall slaughter, both the hosts do stand,
Earth trembling shades beneath their trampling feet,
The singing shafts thicke los'd on every hand,
Fleie to and fro, then hand to hand they meet,
And wound for wound each doth the other greet,
While ouer head the heau'ns remorsefull stood
Dropping downe teares to see their sides drop blood.
Edward the Second.

65.
Valiant Bohun, Herford's undaunted lord,
That stood in fight by foes besieged round,
His heart not female made to fly as skar'd,
Neuer gae backe, but brauely kept his ground,
Till life gae backe from that same deadly wound,
Giu'n by a stout Welch Britaine, that did stand
Beneath the bridge with fataall speare in hand.

66.
This lucklesse chance so terrif'd the foe,
And gae such strength vnto the northerne bands,
That th'aduerse part their backes began to showe,
Clifford, though wounded with a shaft, yet stands
With Lancaster in fight, till on all hands,
Opprest with multitude, themselues they yeeld,
To conquering Herckley victour of the field.

67.
Thus hautie Lancaster, that did not scare
To tempt his soueraigne's peace with periur'd hate,
Who in the morning was the mightiest peere
That 'gainst his prince did ever moue debate,
By night was made the meanest in the state:
In right or wrong, who euer lifts his hand
Against his prince, his cause doth seldom stand.

68.
Not he alone made forfeit of his head,
Who in this proud rebellion led the ring,
The fataall axe strooke many others dead,
Hewing downe all, that had conspir'd to bring
Their powers for fight against their lawfull king:
Twice eight great barons and as many knights
In death paid paines for wrong t'our kingly rites.
Edward the Second.

69.
O age unfortunate, when subjects pride
Did force their soueraigne to such deeds of woe,
That when all men had laid remorse aside,
The sunne in heau'n his griefe in shame to show
Six houres with blood-red cheeks on the earth below,
Did blush to see her soile drinke vp their blood,
Who liuing oft in her defence had stood.

70.
Imprudent prince, since rage did lift thy hand
To lop the pillers of thy kingdome downe,
On whose supportfull powers thy state should stand:
Looke for a ruthlessse ruine of thy crowne,
Looke helplesse now in wretchednesse to drowne:
The dance vnto destruction they haue led,
And the same feeting I the king must tread.

71.
When th'hand of Ioue the mightie men shall take
From any state, for their rebellious pride,
By such foresaigne this use we well may make,
Some after-storme of vengeance will betide
That haplesse land, who euer it doth guide:
The sad effusion of the noble blood,
Portends confusion to the common good.

72.
With dolefull pen I could bewail their woe,
Whose wofull wants did after proue me weake:
But far more horrid things we are to show,
To those blacke deeds, of which we now must speake:
They before spoken did that ice but breake,
At which we falling in did helplesse drowne,
Once fallen, all do helpe to keepe vs downe.
Not Herkleye's treason plotted in that truce,
Which for advancement, most ambitious man,
He did intend t'our adversarie Brewe:
Nor the new troubles, which Valois began
In our dominions Guien and Aquitaine,
Shall be the subject of our sadder verse:
Matter of more importance we rehearse.

O Isabel my queene, my vnhind queene,
Thy shame must be the subject of our song,
Had not the weaknesse of thy faith been seen,
When faithlesse thou wast led to do that wrong
To him that liu'd in love with thee so long:
That royall blood in Berklie castle spilt,
Had now not stain'd our storie with thy guilt.

The scene of lust foreruns the act of blood,
Priapus doth his lustfull breath inspire
Into the queene, the ocean's wauie flood
Cannot extinguish fancie's burning fire,
Nor coole the scalding thirst of her desire:
With heate of lust her inward heart doth gloe,
T'imprisoned Mortimer my mortall foe.

Heere let not any take offensive spleene,
Or take these rimes, for that to light they bring
Th'incontinence of our disloyall queene:
Nor thy muse griewe this argument to sing,
Which is confirmed by the wronged king:
Foule is the fault, though nere so quaint the skill,
That conceales truth to lessen any ill.
Edward the Second.

77.

Wigmore's false Mortimer, (whose fatall name
Vniuocall to him of all his line:
Whether from feare of death we fetch the same,
Or of the dead seas sinke we it define,
The deeds of death t'ensue doth well divine)
    Reserved was by fate within the tower,
    With time to tunnelne the glasse of my last houre.

78.

On him the queene by loose affection led
Did cast her fancie, burning in the flame
Of priuie lust, which strong desier fed:
And wanting her delight in wanton game,
To coole her lust-burnt blood with dregs of shame,
    Did cast about how she might him release,
    That he might giue her loue-sicke passions ease.

79.

It is not bands, nor walles, nor thousands spics
That can the woman's wicked will preuent:
Let loue intreate, set shame before her eies,
Let plighted faith, first virgin vow'd consent,
And the wombe's fruit that gines loue most content,
    Persuade with her: yet can they never stay
    Her wanton will, if she will go astray.

80.

By sleepie potion of effectuall power
To charme the sense, whether by her conuey'd,
Or by himselfe desnised in the tower,
Segraue the constable was captiue made,
With many more to senselesse sleepe betray'd:
    While Mortimer, vnthought vpon, escapes
    And vnto France his prosperous iourney shapes.
Edward the Second.

81.
Thus far did fortune with my queene conspire,
And after this good hap to give full ease
Vnto the longing thirst of her desire,
Tels her how France invades beyond the seas,
Which vp in armes she needs must go t'appense:
When resolution hath prepar'd the will,
It wants no helpes to further any ill.

82.
Through our neglect of homage to be made,
Constrain'd thereto by our home-bred debate,
Valois her brother did our lands invade,
And through late wounds made in our mangled state,
In armes vnable to withstand his hate:
To treate with him of peace our queene we sent,
In her vow'd faith being too too confident.

83.
O powre diuine, what mortall wight hath wings
To soare the height of thy vnknowne decree?
Reason, that hath such power in search of things,
Proves then most blind, when most it seems to see,
In vainly arguing of what must bee:
When reason bids no danger to suspect,
Time hastens swift confusion in effect.

84.
The queene effecting that, for which she went,
With these conditions reunites the peace,
That to such covenants I should consent,
Aniou and Aquitaine I should release
Vnto my sonne, my title should surcease:
And he to France as in times past 't had bin,
Should do his homage for his right therein.
Edward the Second.

85.

Pleas’d in this peace, my selfe, or my yong sonne
Injoynd in person to confirme these things,
The Spencers both being into hatred run,
Not daring be from vnder my safe wings,
So absolute we thinke the power of kings,
Perswade me here to stay and send my sonne,
In hope thereby, what they did feare, to shun.

86.

Thus all hands helping, Isabel againe
To forward that which she on foot had set,
I hauing past my title t’Aquitaine
Vnto the prince my sonne, she sees no let,
But that more easly she the rest may get:
So large a share cut from vs by her skill,
She hopes to haue the whole or want her will.

87.

Hauing obtain’d in France what we require,
She call’d vpnon to make returue with speed,
Protract the time, and feasting her desire
So long with Mortimer, that she doth need
Excuse to warrant her presumptuous deed:
Gives flat deniall to her lord’s command,
Not to returue except with force of hand.

88.

Many, that wau’ring wish’d a change in state,
And more, that on renuenge so long had fed
For losse of friends, that fell in that debate
Betwixt vs and our barons, daily fled
Vnto the queene, whose heart being stricken dead,
As wanting strength to manage her affaire,
They do renewe with powre by their repaire.
While in the French court, yet unfrown'd upon
By Charles her brother king, she did abide,
Our Exceter's true bishop Stapleton,
Joyn'd in commission with her to decide
The iar 'twixt vs and France, now seeing her pride
Burst out in plaine revolt, returning ouer
The seas from her, did all her drifts discouer.

Thus their close treason bare and naked made,
As blushing at their open shame descride,
To cloake the cause of their intent t'insade,
They vow no more to brooke the Spencers pride,
Nor shall the queene vniustly be denide
The presence of the king, they all will die,
Or order things that stand in state awrie.

King Charles her brother, while they thus devise,
Whether with our rich gifts or promise won,
Or with respect to his owne royalties,
Or that he would not be a looker on,
While vnto maistie such wrong was done:
First wooes our queene for peace, whom wilfull bent,
He exiles France to frustrate her intent.

Who now would thinke that she should ever find
A hopefull helpe her weaknesse to repair?
Bewitching beautie, O how dost thou blind
The eyes of man! thy soule is deemed faire,
Thy euill good, thy vice a vertue rare:
In thy distresse although thy cause be wrong,
Thou mou'st remorse and mak'st thy partie strong.
Edward the Second.

93.
Those young bloods, Arthois and Beaumont,
Without respect unto her cause's right,
Those certain helps to her do oft recount
In Heinault to be found, if she excite
The earle thereof to pitie her sad plight:
Which by a match pretended might be done,
Bettwixt his daughter and the prince our sone.

94.
As they gaue counsell, so it came to passe,
She t'Heinault goes with Beaumont for her guide,
And with kind welcome entertained was:
Where while Heinault and she with joy prouide
To make his daughter our yong Edward's bride,
To England lets turne backe, and see at home
How we prepare against the storme to come.

95.
To stand vpon our guard against such harme,
And backe our cause against invading ill,
All castles and strong holds with men we arme,
The coastes are kept, beacons on euery hill
Are set for spies: O had the ioynt good will
Of subjects lune with me their soueraigne bin,
Th'invading foes had found hard entrance in.

96.
In vaine, O wretched king, thy hopes have trust
On broken faithes of subjects daily fleeting:
Thy lot is cast, from throne thou shalt be thrust,
Thy foes shall of thy subjects at their meeting,
In stead of blowes, be welcom'd with kind greeting:
Thou only seek'st to keepe out th'vnkind queene,
While heere at home worse dangers are vseen.
Edward the Second.

97.
Whilst now my state begins for to decline,
In whom, alas, should I my trust repose?
My brother Kent then resident in Guine
For some displeasure done to him by those
Bout vs at home, revolts unto our foes:
O faithlesse Kent, thou art the first shalt rue,
That ever thou to Edward wast untrue.

98.
Treason transports, what traytors looke for heere,
The queen's stout champion John of Beaumont comes
With his proud troopes, three thousand men well neere,
Promis'd rich pay in ransacke of our summes,
Who now aboord with trumpets and with drummes,
Vrg'd by the hastie queene to launch the deepe
With winde-wing'd sailes the seas soft bosome sweepe.

99.
O let the windes their forward course restraine,
Wing not such mischiefe to our native shore,
Let the proud billowes beate them backe againe:
Or if they needs must come, let the seas rode,
Hurl them on rockes that they may never more
Be seene in England in pretence of good,
To bathe their hands in Edward's royall blood.

100.
Orwell thy hauen first did let them in,
Harwich with bels did welcome in their fleet:
No sooner did our Isabel begin
To presse the sandie shore with wanton sect,
But our earle marshall with his powres did greet
Her safe arruie, whose part, false peere, had bin
To haue oppo'd her at her entrance in.
Edward the Second.

101.

The brother to that lord that lost his head,
Leister's great earle did now lift vp his hand,
As in revenge of Lancaster late dead,
T' whom many a peer linckt in rebellious band
Of grudges past, in the queene's cause doth stand:
And lest they grieue in conscience to betray
Their lawfull king, the church leads them the way.

102.

Herford's proud prelate, Torleton, who before
Conuicted was for treason gainst his king,
When armes gainst vs our stubborn barons bore,
Shrowded till now beneath the church's wing,
Fled to the foes, and in his heart did bring
That horrid treason hactht before in hell,
Cause of all after mischiefe that befell.

103.

The newes of this new innovation made,
And of the aliens lately set on land,
With terror doth my fainting heart invade:
All holds about vs readie open stand,
To yeeld possession ere the foes demand:
Whose first smal troope now made a mightie force,
Into the land they take their forward course.

104.

London denies to lend her sou'daigne aid,
To whom inforc'd at length to bid adew,
As doubting there to foes to be betraijd,
With both the Spencers vnto Wales I flew,
There by some powre my hopes yet to renewe,
Hoping amongst the Welsh more faith to find,
T' whom from my youth I had been ever kind.
Edward the Second.

105.
But thus forsaken, whither shal I run?
Where shall I shadow me with safetie's wing?
Since that a wife, a brother, and a sonne,
Pursues a husband, father and a king:
Pitie, adew, my wrong shall never wring
    Remorse from others: Wales conspires my woe,
    And with false England turns vnto my foe.

106.
Pursu'd on every hand, and forc'd to flie
My native soile to shun death's dangerous dart,
My fortunes on the surging seas to trie
In a poore barke, from England we depart
To th'ile of Lunday with an heauie heart,
    Whom from the maine land Suerne doth diuide,
    In which we hope in safetie to abide.

107.
But en'n that little good doth seas denie,
With angrie looke the heau'ns behold the maine,
Gust after gust the winged winds do flie
Upon the waues, who pust with proud disdain,
Will vs deuoure or drie vs backe againe:
    As if too much they thought that little land
    For him that late had kingdomes at command.

108.
Remorselesse waues haue we a kingdome lost,
And yet our barke do ye denie to bring
To this small plot of ground two miles at most:
O woe to tell that once so great a king
Should stoope his minde vnto so small a thing,
    Content to share the meanest part of many,
    And yet deni'd to be possesst of any.
Edward the Second.

109.

Long did we wrestle with the waues and winde,
But all in vaine we striue, for neuer more
Shall friendlesse Edward any comfort find:
Our barke distrest, her tackle rent and tore,
At length arryues vpon Glamorgan shore,
    Where Spencer, Baldocke, Reding, marke for death,
    Go all with me t'a castle called Neath.

110.

With vaine suppose of safetie in that hold,
While there in secret we our selues reposite
To the lords Zouch and Leister we are sold,
Who by rich gifts often corrupting those
That our vnknowne abode could best disclose,
    With violent hands do sease their wished pray,
    And beare vs thence each one a seuerall way.

111.

Leister, thy king is now thy captiue made,
Reuenge is in thy hand, where is thy spleene?
Though vnto thee thy soueraigne was betrai'd:
This be thy praise, thou wouldst not with our queene
In Edward's wrongs be any deeper seene:
    While in thy Killingworth thy king remains,
    Nought doth he want that to a king pertaines.

112.

With a strong guard from starting there kept sure,
Our friends meane time being seas'd on by the foe,
Both Spencers, Reading, Daniel, Mitcheldeure,
In death do happily shut vp their woe,
As pointing out the way that we must go:
    Baldocke in prison by a milder fate,
    Struck dead with grief preuents their deadly hate.
Edward the Second.

113.
They, that vnto the king induc'd by reason
Did loyall proue, were traytors to the state:
O impious age, when truth was counted treason,
Heere noble Arundell I waile thy fate,
Whose blood drunke vp by Mortimer's sterne hate,
Did manifest the spleene, on which he fed
Against his king, for whom thy blood was shed.

114.
Since they by death t'offence haue paid their due,
Who late alone in your displeasure stood,
Whom should your deadly hatred now pursue?
If they were only foes to common good,
That made you satisfaction with their blood:
Why is your liege lord as a common foe
Reseru'd a captive prince for worser woe?

115.
Bloodie reuenge your hatred cannot bound,
So wilfully to greater mischief bent,
The poore imprison'd king must be vnrown'd,
At London by the states in parlament,
It is decreed by mutuall consent:
Edward must be depos'd from royall throne,
Where he had sate now twice ten yeares and one.

116.
O righteous heau'n, if ye haue powre t'oppose
Fraile man's unrighteous thoughts in euery thing:
Then suffer not, ah suffer not my foes
Thus to go on, that are about to bring
Such wofull tidings to a wretched king:
In thrall though I abide, this grace yet giue,
That I at least a captive king may liue.
Edward the Second.

117.
Strengthened by will, though not by force of lawes,
To Killingworth th'appointed states are come,
Where, as in censure of some weightie cause,
Twentie and foure agreed vpon their doome,
In order sit within a goodly roome,
And thither do their king to judgement call,
Who should have sate chiefe judge aboue them all.

118.
From secret closet, though, alas, full loath,
Forth am I brought in mourning weeds, that show
His grieue of mind, whose bodie they do cloath:
And when I would conceale my inward woe,
With head declining downe as I do go,
The grieue I would not see, I see in teares,
Which fallen from mine eies the pavenement beares.

119.
In presence being come and silence made,
Toilet, whose lookes did wound me with despaire,
A man in tongue most powerfull to perswade,
Stands vp, and as design'd for this affaire,
Doth in few words effectuallly declare
The common people's will, the peeres consent
That I thenceforth resigne my gournement.

120.
O heere, what tongue can vnto ytterance bring
The inward grieue, which my poore heart did wound?
So far it past all sense in sorrowing,
Passion so powrefully doth sense confound,
That in a swoune I falling on the ground,
Faine would have di'd, but Leister standing by
Steps in, and doth that happinesse deny.
Edward the Second.

121.
Recall'd from death by those that stood about,
When breath through grieved breast found passage free,
In these sad words my woes I breathed out:
"O powrefull God, since 'tis thy will that wee
Do leave our crowne, I grudge not thy decree:
Thou art most just in all, thou gau'st a crowne,
But ah, mine owne misdeeds haue cast me downe.

122.
To you I yeeld what wrong doth rest from me,
Since with one voice ye say it must be so,
And beg this mercie in my miserie:
That since your hate hath brought me to this woe,
It heere may end, no further let it goe:
He whom once king your hate could not forgive,
Will be no king so he haue leaue to liue."

123.
Heere teares did choake the end of my sad words,
And while my state in silence I deplore,
Trussell in name of all the English lords
Renouncing th'homage due to me before,
Deprives me of the same for euermore:
Leauing his liege that was of most command,
The most dejected subiect of this land.

124.
Blunt, steward of our house in th'open hall,
Protractts no time by any long delay,
But breaking of his rod before them all,
Resignes his office, all depart away,
Many that would in loue, yet dare not stay:
This was my fate, thus did false fortune frowne,
Ah God, that euer king was so cast downe!
Edward the Second.

125.
Yet fortune hath not spent her utmost hate,
With patience we must arm our selues more strong,
Scarce will fraile eares believe what we relate,
When now thy muse shall tune her mournefull song,
To sadder times that she may waile that wrong,
To which with griefe for guide we now proceed,
Whose woes wil make the hardest heart to bleed.

126.
Our jealous queen, whom conscience doth torment,
Fearing lest Leicester so neare alli’d,
In pitie of our state should now relent,
Tels Toleton of her doubts what might betide,
If in his keeping we do still abide,
Who fearing vengeance for his owne offence,
Gives her his counsell to remove me thence.

127.
Leister constrained by expresse command,
To the lord Berkley doth his charge restore,
Whence he conueies me with an armed band
Vnto his castle seated neare the shore,
Gainst which great Seuerne’s raging waues do rere:
But Berkley, thou with Leister art too kind,
Edward with thee doth too much favour find.

128.
Oh gentle Berkly, whither wilt thou go?
Why dost not stand by thy sad sou’raigne’s side?
For pitie leave him not vnto such woe,
Which Gourney and Mestreurs do prouide,
Such woe did neuer any king betide:
But with command they come, thou must depart,
And leave thy king, although with heauie heart.
To Gourney and Materuers by decree
In his owne castle he resignes his right:
Who lest that any friend should privie bee
To my abode, do beare me thence by night
Into Corfe castle, whence with more despight
Through darkness and blind waies in poore array,
To Bristow castle they do me conuey.

By night conuey'd thus rudely to and fro,
Lest by my friends from them I rescu'd bee,
At last since none, whom they do feare, do know
Where I am now become, they do agree
To Berkley backe againe to go with mee,
Staying a time, till night with dewie dampe
Should choake daie's light and put out Phoebus lampe.

Then do they set me on a beast foreworne
In stead of stately steed, whereon to ride,
And for no crowne I had my head t'adorne,
Bare I do sit, except the heau'n to hide
My woefull head all couering they denide,
While sharp winds in my face the weather blowes,
And with their nipping cold augments my woes.

When out of east the day began to peepe,
Who, as if she my ruefull case did mone,
Upon my head her dewie droppes did weepe,
The right hand way they left, and iourn'ing on,
Where Severne's siluer waues doth play upon
The marsh green, they forced me to light,
There to haue slaine my heart with sad despight
Edward the Second.

133.

In stead of royall chaire, they set me downe
On a mole-hill (was never king so vade)
And Gourney, wretched man, in stead of crowne
With wreath of grasse my royall browes abuse,
Patience perforce it might not be refuse:
Then while in wretched case my hands I wring,
In scorne the villaines bid auant sir king.

134.

While thus I sit all carefull comfortless:
With pitious looke cast vp in wofull wise,
Calling the heau"ns to witnesse my distresse,
In stead of tears, the starres like weeping eyes
Drop downe their exhalations from the skies:
And Tithon's bride new rising from her bed,
Beholds their leauenesse with a blushing red.

135.

Yet to my plaints no pitie they do yeeld:
But bent to adde more grieue to my disgrace,
In rustie murren with foule water fill'd,
A villaine comes with hands vnclene and base,
To shawe the heare both from my head and face:
Who, when warme water I desire to haue,
Replies, that cold will serve his turne to shawe.

136.

With eyes full burtned with a showre of teares,
"Do ye," quoth I, "now helpe me with your might
To waile the sorrowes, which my sad soule beares,
Open your floud-gates wide, and in their sight
Let vs haue water warme in their despight:"
This said, the teares did downe my cheekes distill,
As if they strewe t'effect my wofull will.

vol. ii. 5 E
Edward the Second.

137.
Hence in this plight to Berkley am I brought,
Where bidding comfort euermore farewell:
And feeding long on care and pensive thought,
At length I am shut vp in darksome cell,
There to the senselesse walles my griefe to tell,
Dea'd the comfort of beau'n's common light,
Bound while I live to live in endless night.

138.
My sterne tormentors moued with remorse,
Wish death to end my miserable care:
Yet nature will not violently force
Way to a lingering death, they do prepare
By cold, long watching, fast and euill fare:
But, I euon made insensible in woees,
Suffer with patience all they can impose.

139.
In hollow vault, through which the channell past
From forth the towne beneath my chamber flore,
Dead carcasses and loathed things they cast,
Whose grieuous stinch did grieue my senses more
Then all the griefe that I endur'd before:
And forc'd me search the walles for open place,
To some without to waile my woefull case.

140.
Upon a time I through a crannie spi'd
Men hewing timber on the greene fast by,
To whom with drearie deadly voice I cri'd,
"O who will helpe me wretch, that heere do lie
In torment worse then death, yet cannot die?
If any there do mourne man's wretched case,
Helpe me, ah help me from this loathed place."
Edward the Second.

141.
The poore men's hearts are pierc'd with point of woe,
And trembling horror doth their hearts appall
For ruth of wronged king cast downe so low,
Vnable t'helpe me, vnto God they call,
That he may yeeld reliefe to woffull thrall:

Who givng care to mine and their request,
At length in death doth giue my sorrowes rest.

142.
Mischeife from those that guiltie of offence
Did wish my death in letters sent doth bring
A darke enigma bearing double sense,
Which is vnpointed left a doubtfull thing,
Either to kill or not to kill the king,

As in such tearmes " king Edward's blood to spill Refuse ye not to feare I count it ill."

143.
The bloodie villaines construing the same
Vnto that sense, for which it then was sent,
Watch for the night, whose cloudie cloake of shame
With darknessse should conceal their damn'd intent,
Day did abhor the thing 'bout which they went,

And fled away, grim night on th'earth did frowne,
And I in carefull bed had laid me downe.

144.

Where for musitian that with sweetest breath,
Had wont to lull my watchfull sense asleep:
The ghastly owle, the fatall bird of death,
That on my chamber walles her inne did keepe
In my poore trembling heart impressed deepe

The fear of death with her too deadly note,

Which oft she shrieked through her balefull throte.
Edward the Second.

145.
The murmuring noise of the rude waters rore
Which not far thence into the seas do fall,
Where Suerne's billowes do beat upon the shore,
And bellowing winds which jutling gainst the wall
Like death's shrill whistlers at the cranies call,
   Through darknesse and deepe silence of the night,
   Our troubled heart with horror doth affright.

146.
On searefull things long musing I do lie,
At last with sleepe opprest, in slumber cast,
Vpflaw the doores and in the murderers fie,
At which awakt, and suddenly agast,
As from my naked bed I thought t'haue past,
   They with rude hands do hold me downe by force,
   While with vaine words I seeke to moue remorse.

147.
"Ye deadly instruments of other's ill,
Grant one request, which dying I do craue:
Since ye be bent this royall blood to spill,
Send me not hence with torture to the grave:
'Tis life ye seeke, the only thing I haue:
   Which yet shall vade on wings of willing breath,
   Since better tis to die then live in death."

148.
By this they with maine strength do me compell,
Strengthlesse for breath to yeeld to their intent:
And then, O horrid, shamefull thing to tell,
By force they thrust an hollow instrument
Much like a trumpe into my fundament,
   By which they do preuent the mone I make
By sudden death, as thus to them I spake.
Edward the Second. 765

149.

"Ah why, why thus torment ye me with smart?
Leave off to grieve:" not one word more I said,
They had by this time thrust me to the hart
With steele red hot: to sleepe me downe I laid,
And with the pray'rs which godly folke had made,
When from the castle they did heare my cries,
My soule on mercie's wings did clime the skies.

150.

Thus hauing heard my lamentable fall
Procur'd by stubborne peeres disloyaltie,
And people's wilfull hate, the spring of all
First flowing from deceitfull flatterie,
That deadly bane t'all princely royaltie:
Amongst the rest in place with painfull pen
Insert it for a Mirrour unto men.
THE LAMENTABLE

Lives and Deaths of the two yong

Princes, Edward the Fifth, and his Brother Richard Duke of Yorke.

THE ARGUMENT.

"Th'afflictions, which this wronged king did beare,
He dead," said Memorie, "reenged were:
Like Vulcan's bride, at Nottingham, his queene
In th'armes of Mars-like Mortimer was scene:
He for such deeds, as all true honor staines,
By ignominious death did pay just paines:
By righteous doome till death she liu'd in thrall,
Within the circuit of a castle's wall:
Her first-borne sonne, the second Edward's heire, (Shewing to French king Philip call'd the faire, Left liuing of his line) by her made claime
Vnto his right in France, and gain'd the same;
He dead, the second Richard, second sonne
To his first-borne, his fatal raigne begonne:
Richard depos'd, Henrie ascends the throne,
Heire to duke John, king Edward's fourth borne sonne,
He disposest lord Roger Mortimer,
In Richard daies proclaim'd apparant heire,
The two yong Princes.

Who had duke Lionel's daughter for his mother,
Edward's third sonne, to John the elder brother:
Yet did this Henrie after much unrest
Die in the throne of England's crowne possest:
And to his Henrie did bequeath the same,
The fifth and most illustre of that name:
Who in those few yeares of his happy raigne
Did the French crowne to England's right regaine:
Died in his manly prime, left his yong sonne
Henrie the sixth to sit vpou the throne:
Gainst whom Plantagenet, Yorke's noble duke
Stood for his right, who his iust title take:
From Lionel, fourth by descent from him:
Yet in his quarrell lost both life and lim:
His sonnes reueng'd his death, put Henrie downe,
Edward his eldest did obtaine the crowne:
In peace retain'd it, left it to his heires,
Who are the next, that in their turne appeares:
For they except, here none exempted be,
Since the sad second Edward's tragedie:
Two noble youths are left in yongest yeares
Vnto the guidance of the iarrings peeres,
Edward the eldest comes from Ludlowe's towne
To London, with intent to take the crowne,
His uncle Rivers, Vaughan and lord Grey
By Gloster's plots, who sought their liues decay,
From him removed are, yong Yorke his brother
Doth flee to sanctuarie with his mother:
Whom Richard his false uncle thence doth bring
Into the tower vnto the vnckown'd king:
Vsurps the crowne, puts both the youths to death,
Who twixt the sheets betray'd, expire their breath:
The truth of which that we may heere partake,
Their princely ghosts let fame from sleepe awake.
The two yong Princes.

ANOTHER ARGUMENT.

At fame's first call the princes both ascend,
And both by turne do tell their tragick end.

Richard.

What wit so sharpe is found in age or youth,
That can distinguish trust from treacherie?
Falsehood puts on the face of simple truth,
And masks in th'habit of plaine honestie,
When she in heart intends most villanie:
   The panther with sweet saavour of her breath
   First charmes their sense, whom she hath markt for death.

2.

Of which that future time may mirrours haue
By the fourth Edward's murdered progenie,
Vp (brother) vp and let vs leaue our graue
In this night's vision call'd by Memorie,
To tell the truth of our sad tragedie,
   That princes happily by vs may learne
   Trust from false treason truly to discerne.
The two yong Princes.

3.
And thou, O mournefull muse, that didst of yore
Th'iniurious wrongs of many a prince complaine,
Helpe two deposed princes to deplore
The wretched fortunes which they did sustaine:
Matter thou hast that fits a ruthfull straine,
How Richard's treason twixt the sheets did smother
The infant orphants of his kingly brother.

4.
That we may keepe decorum in discourse,
And into order may digest it well,
Let vs alternally succeed in course:
And that we turne by turne may truly tell
Of every circumstance, as it befell,
(Brother) do you begin to mind to call
Our vnclle's treason and our tragick fall.

Edward.

Must I begin those bloodie pathes to goe,
In which the prints of Gloster's steps remaine?
Draw neere then all, that list to heare of woe,
And while our restlesse wrongs I do complaine,
If you lament our losse of life and raigne,
Your sighes soft breathed in still plaints of pitie,
Be the sad musike to our dolefull dittie.

6.
The sonnes we are of that renowned lord
Edward the fourth, who did the right restore
To Yorke againe with his victorious sword:
Which Lancaster in three descents that wore,
The royall crowne had kept from vs before,
Ending those iarres, which Gaunt's ambitious son
With royall Richard's blood had first begun.
The two yong Princes.

7.

Three brothers had he, whom by fate's sterne will,
Remorselesse death vntimely did deouure,
Rutland's yong earle, whom Clifford's sword did kill,
Clarence, that duke, who in the fatall tower
In Malmsey But did meet his liue's last houre:
Richard the yongest, who was stain'd with guilt
Of Clarence blood and ours, both which he spilt.

8.

O that desire of rule so much should blind
The eyes of men, or that to gaine a crowne,
The godlike part of man, th'immortall mind
Of wrathfull heau'n should dare t'incurre the frowne,
And cast it selfe from glorie headlong downe!
O foule ambition, had thy guilt not stain'd
This tyrant's deeds, what glorie had he gain'd?

9.

For though he from his mother's painfull throwes,
Mark't for a plague into the world was brought;
Yet with his sword gainst our Lancastrian foes
In many bloodie broiles he manly fought:
And by his courage high achieuements wrought,
Great Warwick, Oxford, Clifford, and the rest,
Did finde a valiant heart in Richard's brest.

10.

But where are now those deedes, or who can say
That they with praise doe glorifie his name?
How can he euer hope to wipe away
Those spots of blood vpon the face of fame,
Making his deeds to blush at his owne shame?
What deedes of fame he did are not his owne,
His euill deeds remaine to him alone.
The two yong Princes.

11.
With their shed blood thy lines I will not staine,
Whom wrackt by troops to graue his hand did send,
To him in his succeeding tragick straine,
The sad report thereof I doe commend:
Enough it is to tell of our owne end,
To which I will proceede, first setting downe
The plots our uncle vs'd t'obtaine the crowne.

12.
When on the throne my kingly father sat,
All noise of warre new husht, euin in the greene
Of peace late crowne discord did set debate
Betweene the kindred of our mother queene,
And twixt the peeres, who with malignant spleene,
 Did swell to see them fauor'd of the king,
 From whence our future ruine first did spring.

13.
On this, as on a platforme firme and sure,
Gloster did build his hopes for future daies:
Yet England's Edward hoping to procure
Peace twixt both parts, did seeke by oft assaies
T'appense the strife, which priuie hate did raise:
And at his death did cause them each to other
To gieue their faith, as brother vnto brother.

14.
The king scarce dead, from London swift report
With mischiefe at her heele, or e hedge and heath
To Ludlowe came, where then we kept our court,
And there with pallid lookes, halfe out of breath,
She tells the tidings of our father's death,
Bidding me now beware vnhappy fate,
And looke about in this new change of state.
The two yong Princes.

15.

Though time with so few yeeres my youth had crown'd,
That yet scarce fourteene times the heauenly Ram
Had push't his horns against the new yeare's bound,
Since first into the world to light I came:
Yet of my father's death, when lucklesse fame
Had rung the dolefull knell: then did I know
The danger which I was to undergoe.

16.

Nurst from my cradle in true discipline,
In my weake childhood I had scand this theame,
That if th'ambitious with cleere sighted eyne
Could but discern what fortune gaue to them,
When they had gain'd a kingdom's diadem,
They would account that day their blisse to ende,
In which their steps the throne did first ascend.

17.

Our vnkle Rivers, who my gardian was,
With vs at Ludloue, then being resident,
Did muster vp his powers with vs to passe
To London by short iournies, with intent
All danger in our passage to preuent:
But Gloster did intrappe both him and me,
And by his plots did frustrate his decree.

18.

By wicked wits, the queene he doth perswade,
To thinke that since by her deceased king,
Betwixt the peeres a vnion had beene made,
With such a power, it were a dangerous thing,
The prince her sonne, to London vp to bring:
Distrust might soone disturbe the quiet state,
And gue new life to the old dead debate.
The two yong Princes.

19.
Blinded with this deceit, our carefull mother
Directs her letters, bearing such effect
Vnto our vncle Riuers, her deare brother,
Who doubting lest his foes might ought object
Thau e gone amisse, while he did vs protect,
Dismit his powers, and only did retaine
Those, that before were of our daily traine.

20.
All readie now to hoise vp happie saile,
For London we our fatall course do stere,
Our hopes do promise vs a prosperous gale;
But once set forth, clouds thicken in the cleare,
A storme before vs plainly doth appeare,
And with a gust in gulfe of woe cast downe,
Vnhappie I made shipwrecke of my crowne.

21.
At Stonie-Stratford, being vpon my way,
The bloodie bore, my vncle, that did aime
At England’s diadem by our decay,
With that false duke, disloyall Buckingham,
With show of humble loue in presence came:
But after tender of their duties done,
To put their plot in practise they begun.

22.
They falsely did accuse of treacherie
My two halfe brothers by our mother’s side,
Lord Marquesse and lord Grey, then standing by,
Obiecting gainst them both, that prickt with pride
They sought the realme and me, yet yong, to guide;
And with our vncle Riuers, thought to bring
The noble peeres in hatred with the king.
The two yong Princes.

23.
Without respect vnto our princely state,
With violent hands they beare them both away,
Too weake were we of power t'auert that fate,
Which in our sight did threaten their decay,
Our words were weaker, Gloster bore the way:

Rivers my uncle, Vaughan, Grey, all three,
After that time I never more did see.

24.
Rob'd of my friends, to London we are led,
Upon the way mourning with sighes and teares,
The wretched fate to fall upon my head,
Grieze with a multitude of pensiue feares
Sits heauie on my heart: yet in my eares

Gloster to please me, sings this syren's song,

"All should be well:" when nought was ment but wrong.

25.
Coney'd to London, where while I abide
Within the bishop's place, I little knew
Of any tidings, that did then betide,
The tyrant, (brother Yorke) then aim'd at you
To hasten that, which after did ensue:

Then take your turne againe, and briefly tell,
What in my absence vnto you befell.

Richard.

I shall obey, and truly bring to light
The darke dissembling, and the much vntroth
Of periur'd peers, to rob vs of our right,
How our queene mother carefull of us both,
With me to holy sanctuarie goth,

And of our uncle's plots to bring me thence,
Which was the only bar to his pretence.
The two yong Princes.

27.

When fame with terour vnto our queene mother,
Then dewing our dead father's cheeokes with teares,
Brought the surprise of her two sonnes and brother,
O how those tidings tingled in her eare!
Suspitious thoughts begat a thousand feares,
Forecasting by that vnexpected horne,
The greater mischiefe of a following storme.

28.

In this distraction of a doubtfull mind
In change of state, seeing such crosse fortune's frowne,
And doubting in distressefull times to find,
Her friends turn'd foes to helpe to plucke vs downe,
And to bereaue vs of our father's crowne:
With me to sanctuarie she did goe,
There to remaine in safetie from our foe.

29.

Of which, when tidings to the tyrant came,
As one depruied of his wished pray,
His wits best engines he begins to frame,
And if they faile, he doth resolve t'assay
With hands prophane to fetch me thence away:
While from his reach I there did safely won,
He could not finish what he had begun.

30.

Which our queene mother did presage before,
And thought by force of sanctuarie's right,
Safely to shield vs from the cruell bore,
Who with his tuskes the elder durst not smite,
While I the yonger liued in such safe plight:
By death of th'one, the crowne how could be gaine,
If th'other after living did remaine?
The two yong Princes.

31.
The substil tyrant to effect his will,
This faire pretence vnto the peeres doth frame,
That for th’auoiding of a generall ill,
Since to the prince and them it was a shame,
That causelesse I shou’d sanctuarie claime,
Vnto the place he thought it no offence,
If not by peace, by force to fetch me thence.

32.
Yet to obtaine our mother queene’s consent,
Vnto the place before he offer wrong,
The cardinall of Yorke for that intent,
A man graue, sober, substil, wise, and strong,
To charm an are with his inchanting tongue,
He doth select to further this affaire,
And to his vnknowne plots way to prepare.

33.
When he with many more in presence came,
He with faire speech begins to greet our mother:
Then tells, how to the prince it was a shame,
That she should kepe me there, as if one brother
Did live in dread of danger by the other,
What grieue my absence was vnto the king,
What comfort by my presence I should bring.

34.
Proceeding on vnto the future ill,
Which might ensue by ouer much distrust,
The strengthening of her inconsiderate will,
With sanctuarie’s gift by claime vniust,
The pruulge of the place by them discust,
Found not of force to her to yeeld the same,
Who did not truly want, what she did claime.
The two yong Princes.

35.
The queene effectually doth answere all,
He turnes replie, she doth reioyne againe,
And puts such questions to the cardinall,
That at a non plus set, he doth remaine
In silent pause, till chaft in tearnes more plaine,
    He threatfully declares the pieres pretence,
    Who had decreed by force to fetch me thence.

36.
With this hard speech, our mother in affright,
Round set with doubts, not knowing when or where,
She safely might conuey me from their sight:
In silence stands, her lookes bewrayes pale feare,
Which she would vtter, yet doth oft forbear,
    Till taking me by th'hand, sighes forcing teares,
    And teares sad words, no longer she forbeares.

37.
"Behold," said she, "I to your trust commit
This noble impe, whom with the prince his brother,
When in the generall judgement God shall sit,
I at your hands will aske: feare with the mother,
What may betide him taken to another:
    I make no doubt, but ye will faithfull be,
    Yet others may deceiue both you and me.

38.
Heere I resigne:" and at that word she paus'd,
As loth so soone to part with such a thing:
Then with a sigh, to shew that grieue had caus'd
That silent pause, "to you," quoth she, "I bring
This royall issue of a late dead king:
    Yours be the charge, vnto the child proue true:"
Which said, she thus gaue me my last adew.
vol. ii.

5 G
The two yong Princes.

39.

"Farewell my little sonne, God be thy aid;"
With that she turn'd about, and wept for woe:
Then being about to part, she turn'd and said,
"Kisse me my sonne, kisse me before thou go,
When we shall kisse againe, our God doth know:"
We kist, she sigh'd, I wept and did refuse
So to depart from her; but could not chuse.

40.

Leaving the queene, I absent, to deplore me,
For that I was an infant then in yeares,
To the Star-chamber in their armes they bore me,
Where our false vnkle to delude the peeres,
My pensiuenesse with words of comfort cheers:
"Now welcome from my heart, my lord," quoth he,
Then tooke me in his armes and kissed me.

41.

Thence brother vnto you I was conuey'd
Then in that place, where London's prelates dwell,
Whence like two lambs vnto a wolfe betrai'd,
We to the Tower were led: where what befell,
Since it concerns you most, you best can tell:
Be it your turne, our sorrowes to deplore,
For I, alas, for sighes can say no more.

Edward.

If I must tell the horror of that night,
In which by death our soules were set on wing,
Let sorrow lend vs her sad pen t'indite
In lines of woe, what I to light shall bring,
And teach our muse so ruthfully to sing,
That the sad reader's ruthfull eyes may drop,
Teares at each point, to teach him where to step.
The two yong Princes.

43.
Within the Tower, of which my brother spake,
Lockt vp from sight of all our friends we were,
Where while we do expect, when I shall take
The crowne on me, t’whom whilome every peere,
As to their soueraigne sealtie did sweare:
At last report these fearefull newes doth bring,
We were depos’d, Gloster was England’s king.

44.
Which, when I first did heare, a thrilling feare
Ran through my heart, and sighing thus I spake:
“Alas, that I was borne king Edward’s heire,
Would God my vnclc, though from me he take
My crowne, which willingly I could forsake,
Would leave vs that, which none but God can giue,
And for my kingdome giue vs leave to liue.”

45.
Thenceforth the tower, which late was deem’d my court,
Is made our prison by a tyrant’s might:
Farewell the world, our day now waxeth short,
Our gladsome sunne of comfort and delight,
Is overcast with clouds of envious night,
Winter is come eu’n in our spring of youth,
Our late sweet smiles are drown’d in teares of ruth.

46.
O noble Edward, from whose royall blood
Life to these infant bodies nature drew,
Thy roses both are cropt eu’n in the bud:
Why didst thou leave that bore in time t’ensue,
To spoile those plants that in thy garden grew?
Of all that harvest which thy hand did sow,
Nought haue we reaped but a crop of woe.
The two yong Princes.

47.
Who now amongst thy peeres of note or name,
The sad mishap of thy deare sonnes doth mone?
Where's Howard, Louell, Barkley, Buckingham,
That bound themselues by oath to thee, that none
But thy faire sonnes should sit vpon the throne?

Woe worth them all, they all do now crie, "downe
With Edward's heires, let Gloster haue the crowne."

48.
Ah pitie, in what region didst thou dwell,
Had'st thou been present in those hatefull times,
Then should not I thy shame, O England, tell,
Nor should I seek to proue thy wicked crimes
Vnto thy face in these impartiall rimes:

Thy princes, on whose state misfortune frown'd,
In thy false people pitie seldome found.

49.
Search time's records, there see how poysoned John
Stands vp to witnesse thy sterne people's hate,
See how the second Edward thrust from throne,
Cries for reuenge on people of that state,
Behold thy shame in Richard's wofull fate:

Gainst whom thy nation vnremorsefull stood,
Till Pomfret's wals were sprinkled with his blood.

50.
But why seeke I, O England, to reclaime thee,
By sounding former euils in thine care?
That's yet vntold, the which alone shall shame thee,
As oft of it as any age shall heare,

Tyrants, in whom no pitie doth appeare,
Shall thee vpbraid, and blushing at thy shame,
For past compare shall register the same.
The two yong Princes.

51.
When as our vnclie had obtain'd his will,
The crowne scarce warme on his vsurping head,
Opprest with care to keepe that gotten ill,
He takes no rest of mind in bowre nor bed,
Suspition with the guilt of conscience fed
   Breeds doubts, distractions, horrors in his brest,
   Which like to hags do haunt him with unrest.

52.
Each step he treads, by which he climbs his throne,
Is grounded on the death of some great peere:
As he ascends, he sees their blood thereon:
Set in his chaire, shame whispers in his eare
That's not his place, his nephew should be there:
   Doubt askes him, how he hopes t'endioy that long,
   When they do liue, whose right he keepes by wrong.

53.
He that had drunke so oft of murder's cup,
To reach that height to which he did aspire,
Now fils the measure of his mischiefe vp,
And in vaine hope to raise his heart yet higher,
Spare not the blood deduc'd from his owne sire:
   Poor orpanes blood, pris'd at a crowne's rich wealth,
   To his sicke state can only promise health.

54.
Whilst every where his wandring eye doth range
To find some wretch to put this taske vpon,
All things about vs haue a sudden change,
Vngra'd, not car'd for, comforted of none,
By our owne servants we are left alone:
   Those that bemone our fortunes dare not stay,
   By feare constrain'd, with griefe they go their way.
The two yong Princes.

55.
Inconsolatly left in wofull plight,
Each helping other for to waile and weep,
In dole we spend the day, and in the night
Horror and dread of death doth waking keepe
Our watchfull eyes, and bars them of their sleepe,
Each little noise, each windie puffe of breath
Affrights vs infants with th'approch of death.

56.
Thou fatall building stain'd with noble blood,
Thou den where horror and darke treason lies,
Say if thou wast, since thy foundation stood,
More mou'd to pitie humaine miseries,
Hearing the echo of sad sorrow's cries:
Then when yong Yorke with pitious plaints and mones
Powr'd forth his sorrowews to thy senselesse stones.

57.
Euen as sometimes we see a silly lambe,
Which for the slaughter in some fold is pent,
There kept from sight of his deare loued damme,
Her absence with faint bleating doth lament,
Whose only sight can giue it safe content:
So little Yorke in vaine lamenting wept,
That from our mother's presence he was kept.

58.
Oft, wofull child, thus hast thou question'd mee,
"Where is my mother?" and when I for woe,
Haue turn'd my backe and could not answere thee:
With teares againe, thou wouldest aske to know,
Saying, "I would vnto my mother go:"
But woe, alas, what comfort could I giue thee,
When of all meanes our vncele did depryue mee?
The two yong Princes.

59.
While thus we waste in woe, the tyrant king
With death to right those, whom he did abuse
With wrong in life, finding a way to wing
Mischief deuised, a wretched man did chuse
For this affaire, which others did refuse:
    Tirril by name, a knight decay'd in state,
    Prone t'act this deed in hope of happie fate.

60.
Two desperate villaines, hatefull to those times,
Forrest and Dighton, men obscure and base :
Yet to the world notorious for leau'd crimes,
For Tirri's gold this damned deed embrace,
Who being brought into convenient place,
    Wait for advantage of the gloomie night
    To couer that, which did abhorre the light.

61.
The night comes on, and murder doth begin
To act her part within the fatall Tower,
In that dead time of night, the cloake of sinne,
In which the clock chimes twelue, the chiefest houre
When sleepe on man and beast doth use his powre,
    Both the rude slaines on vs poore infants flic,
    As we together in our bed did lie.

62.
Betwixt the sheets they keepe vs downe by force,
We struggle against death with gasping grones,
They in their hard hearts feeling no remorce,
To heare poore soules powre forth such pitious mones,
As might with pitie moue the ruthless stones,
    Holding the pillowes downe do stop our breath,
    Vntill we both giue vp the ghost in death.
Thus hast thou heard, how after all his cares
King Edward's fruit did perish in the bud,
By which since we may see how pride prepares
Her passage through the spoile of common good,
Without respect t'affinitie of blood:
That thou may make a Mirrour of the same,
A place amongst thy Mirrors we do claime.
THE TRAGICAL LIFE

and Death of King Richard the Third.

THE ARGUMENT.

"The lamentable fall," quoth Memorie,
"Of two such noble youths may Mirrors be,
That man high mounted on ambitious wing,
T'obtain a crowne attempteth any thing:
They dead, their uncle's tragedie succeeds:
His monstrous birth, his shape, his bloodie deeds:
Horror of conscience haunts him with vrest,
The mightie Buckingham's attempt vnblest:
The tyrant envying noble Richmond's good,
By treason seekes to spill his royall blood,
His strange escape from France to Britanie,
Pursu'd by Landois his false enemie,
His safe arrriue vpon the English coast,
The skilfull marshalling of either hoast
On Bosworth plaine, the order of the fight:
Stout Norfolke's fall, the king's part put to flight
His desperat valour shew'd on th'aduerse force,
The shamefull vsage of his conquered corse,
Which that we heare, let fame his ghost compe
To leaue his graue, that he the same may tell."

vol. ii. 5 H
Through night's darke shadowes from the house of bale,
The tyrant's ghost comes vp to tell his tale.

1.
Horror pursues the homicide's sad soule,
Fear hunts his conscience with an hue and crie,
That drinks the blood of men in murder's bowle,
Suspicious thoughts do rest in life denie,
Hate seldome suffers him in peace to die,
   By heau'n's inuiolate doome it is decreed,
   Whose hands shed blood, his heart in death should bleed.

2.
I was to noble Yorke the yongest sonne
Of foure, which he begot in lawfull bed,
First Edward was, the next place Edmund wonne,
Rutland's yong earle by Clifford's hand stroke dead.
Clarence the third, to death vntimely lead:
   I was the last: of all the foure the worst,
   By heau'n and nature in my birth accurst.
Richard the Third.

3.
When my sad mother in her fruitfull wombe
Bore me a painfull burthen to and fro,
Then the babe's infant bed had been my tombe,
Had not keene rasors to her paine and woe
Cut me a way, vnto the world to goe:
    Nature did grudge to think, that from her wombe
    A man-like monster to the world should come.

When first I came into this world's huge vast,
My birth was not as others wont to bee:
First did my feet come forth, as if in hast
The child of discord had been then set free,
To cause the wretched world to disagree,
    Heau'n at that time told b'inauspitious starres
    Nations far off of England's ciuil warres.

5.
As hunger-steru'd to flesh my iawes in blood
I readie toothed came, as who'would say,
Nature by signes vnto the world hath show'd
How fiercely he shall bite another day,
That in his mother's wombe well toothed lay,
    And maruaile 'twas, seeing viper-like he came,
    He was not borne by death of his owne damme.

6.
If like a cunning painter on a frame
My shape vnto the world I could descrie,
And with a curious pensell paint the same
In perfect colours, each spectatour's eie
Would by my lookes into my manners prie:
    The bodie's ill-shapte limbes are oft defin'd,
    For signes of euill manners in the mind.
Little I was, and of a small compact,
My left side shoulder higher then the right,
Both crooked were, and therewithall contract
Into my backe, so that in all men's sight
I did appeare a most mishapen wight:
   And hard it was to judge, if that my soule
Or limbes ill fashion'd feature were more foule.

The deeds of noble Yorke I not recite,
Done in those fatall daies of miserie,
Nor tell th'events of every speciall fight,
As at Saint Albones, Bloreheath, Banburie,
Northampton, Barnet, Wakefield, Teukesburie,
   Seeing they are often spoken of before,
By those, that heere their wofull falles deplore.

Th'induction to my storie shall begin
Where the sixth Henrie's Edward timelesse fell:
Some to stout Margaret that noble queene,
Of whom since heere no poet's pen doth tell:
Though bee a peerelesse prince deserue it well,
   In brefe we will describe the manner all
Of our sterne deede and his vn happie fall.

His mother queene, the manlike Margaret,
After so many a fall in fight cast downe,
With her young Edward and stout Somerset
Did lastly hazard all for England's crowne
In fight at Teukesburie: but heau'n did frowne,
   Wenlocke and Somerset fled both away,
Left vs the field, and lost their queene the day.
Richard the Third.

11.
The forlorn prince was taken as he fled
By Richard Crofts, a knight of Glostershire,
Who hearing of the proclamation spread,
That, who could bring him forth, should, for his hire,
Duly receive a hundred poundes by yeere:
The prince he brought to end our ancient strife,
With promise made, that we should saue his life.

12.
In presence brought, the king to him thus spake:
"Fond wretch," said he, "what did thy thoughts excite
To come within my kingdome's bounds, and take
Rebellious armes t'oppugne thy soueraigne's right,
And traitor-like in field 'gainst me to fight?"
To which the prince, in whose bold breast did lie
An inbred courage, made this stout replie:

13.
"I came," said he, "to set my father free,
Whom thou in hold vniustly dost retaine:
I came to reobtainie my dignitie,
And in the throne to seate my sire againe,
In which as king thou wrongfully dost raigne:
I am by might enforc'd to stoope to thee,
Who should by right be subiect vnto mee."

14.
The king being mou'd with this his stout replie,
Thrust him away, in whose heroicke brest
My brother Clarence, Hastings, Grey, and I,
Did sheath our blades, which fact heau'n did detest,
Permitting vs not vnreuen'd to rest:
For none of vs in peaceful bed did lie,
When from this world our wretched soules did flie.
Richard the Third.

15.
He dead, his sire, that poore deposed king,
The aged Henrie, sixt of that same name,
Liu'd in the Tower, depriu'd of every thing
Which to a king pertain'd: yet did he frame
His thoughts with patience to endure the same,
Liuing a paterne of a patient spirit,
Who for his fame a golden verse doth merit.

16.
I thought, that while this noble king had breath,
His friends my brother's peace would still invade:
Wherefore I did contrive his sudden death,
And in the Tower the butcher's part I plaide,
For th'hatefull point of that same bloodie blade,
Scarce cold with luke-warm blood of his owne sonne,
Unlooked for, I through his sides did runne.

17.
He dead, the battels fought in field before,
Were turn'd to meetings of sweet amitie,
The war-gods thundring cannons dreadfull rore,
And rating drum-sounds warlike harmonie,
To sweet tun'd noise of pleasing minstralsie,
The haile-like shot, to tennis balles were turn'd,
And sweet perfumes in stead of smoakes were burn'd.

18.
God Mars laid by his launce and tooke his lute,
And turn'd his rugged frownes to smiling lookes,
In stead of crimson fields; warre's fatall fruits,
He bath'd his limbes in Cypris' warbling brookes,
And set his thoughts vpon her wanton lookes,
All noise of warre was husht vpon our coast,
Plentie each where in casefull pride did boast.
Richard the Third.

19.
The king, who swims in streams of court delights,
Plaies like the fish so long with pleasure's bait,
That on her deadly bane he often bites,
Or like the mariner infortunate,
Saying in seas where syrens lie in wait:
To please the sense he lends his care so long,
Till he be charm'd with their enchanting song.

20.
Meane time not made to feast an amorous eie,
I fox-like lurking lay about the king,
Into the actions of the peeres I prie,
With cautic observation of each thing,
While with their wanton sou raigne renewing:
They vainly spend in Venus vassallage
The tedious houres of that peacefull age.

21.
But clouds do thicken in this peacefull clere,
Warwicke's faire daughter forc'd by vnkind fate,
Forsakes lord Clarence her beloued feere,
Who purposing to take for second mate,
The only heire of some hie towring state,
Did hope t'espose with nuptials solemnely,
Duke Charles his daughter, heire of Burgundie.

22.
Which when the queene and her allies doth heare,
At Clarence fortunes daily they repine,
And to the king in hast this newes do beare,
Who to their words his will doth so incline,
That Clarence match is broke by his designe,
King Edward jealous of his children's fate,
Gainst Clarence in his heart beares secret hate.
This opportunitie I straight do snatch,
Striking the steel while yet the fire is in,
In the king's brest such hatred I do hatch
Against our brother, that his hand I win
To further me in my intended sinnen:
    For that blind riddl' of the letter G,
    George lost his life, it tooke effect in me.

Thus hauing halfe my purpose in my hand
By Clarence death, I cast how to confound
The noble queene's neere kinsmen, who would band
Themselves against me by law of nature bound,
When Edward's boodie should be laid in ground:
    But while the king, my brother did suruive,
    To worke their woe, nought durst my thoughts continue.

Yet whom in court I did perceiue, that bore
A grudging heart against their vpstart state:
My brother's death to him I did deplore,
Auouching them with their malignant hate,
    Which at such odds the peeres and them did set,
    That never age such discord did beget.

Fortune in midst of this their wicked strife,
With pleasing looke so smil'd on my intent,
That by the sudden losse of Edward's life,
My kingly brother, she did seeme t'assent
To grant me good sucesse in the event:
    The king late sick, leaues heere the peeres at oddes,
    And flies the place of mortall men's abodes.
Richard the Third.

27.
His corps scarce couered with a clod of clay,
His kingly ghost of beauie newes to tell:
Earle Rivers, Vaughan, and lord Richard Grey,
The kindred of the queene I did compell
To follow him, amongst the dead to dwell,
Unhappie Hastings, Buckingham and I
At Pomfret castle caused them to die.

28.
They dead, protector by consent of peers
To hold the sterne in state I chosen am:
My nephew yet being in his youngest yeares,
Which once attain'd by helpe of Buckingham,
To higher things ambitiously I aime,
Who for my promise of promotion, gane
His minde to mine, in each thing I could craue.

29.
Hastings, whose loyaltie stood in my way,
Vpon his fall to build my future power,
As he at counsell sate vpon a day
With other lordings in the fatall Tower,
By my deceit there met his liue's last houre:
Where he, fond lord, did think himselfe most sure,
His best deem'd friends swift death did him procure.

30.
The way made plaine by plucking others downe,
That might withstand in such a generall ill,
With some pretence of title to the crowne,
To win the giddie people to our will,
A man whose tongue could honie drops distill,
One doctor Shaw, then deem'd a great diuine,
To undertake this task we did assigne.
Richard the Third.

31.
He in a sermon fitting mine intent,
Did seek to prove my brother's progenie
Unlawful issue: and with my consent
Chargeth my mother with adulterie,
Of Edward's and lord Clarence bastardie,
   Auouching me to be Yorke's true borne child,
On whom our house their hopes might only build.

32.
To this his sermon, as it was decreed,
Rushing amongst the people in I came,
Where he most impudent, in hope to breed
Affection in the audience did not shame,
On me with loud applauses to exclaim:
   For flying from his text when I came in,
      In praise of me, thus did the wretch begin.

33.
"This is," quoth he, "that very noble duke,
The speciall patron of true chivalrie,
Who both in favour and in princely looke,
As well as in the mind's true qualitie,
Doth represent his father's physnomie:"
   Thus did he seek the people's hearts t'incline,
      But purchas'd nought but his disgrace and mine.

34.
For after, when disloyall Buckingham
Vnto the commons that set speech did make,
Which with inuictive scandal he did frame
Against the late dead king: when much he spake
To move them, me for lawfull prince to take:
   Strooke dumbe with shame, of so abhorr'd a thing,
      Not one amongst them crie, "God save the king."
Richard the Third.

35.
After I had obtain'd by tyranny,
The fancied blisse of empire and renowne:
I thought so long as Edward's progenie
Did breath on earth, fortune did seeme to frowne,
Threatning to cast my new got glorie downe:
Wherefore, betwixt the sheets with cruel paine,
Unhappie I did cause them to be slaine.

36.
Thinking thenceforth to enjoy all worldly blisse,
And with my crowne's delight my soule to feast:
What I expect, I do not only misse,
But am depruied eu'n of that small rest,
Of which before that time I was possesst:
Conscience my former deeds in question brings,
And frights my guiltie soule with fearfull things.

37.
Each night, when quiet sleepe should close mine eies,
Long waking on my pallat I do lie,
And if by chance sleepe doth my sense surprise,
Then doth illusion set before mine eie
My murthered nephewes, who aloud do crie,
Calling for vengeance for that bloodie sinne,
In strangling them the diadem to wiane.

38.
Then starting vp from forth my naked bed,
With sword in hand I frantike-like would fie
About my chamber, and orecome with dread,
Unto my guard I oftentimes would crie,
That treason in my chamber hid did lie:
Thus the remembrance of my wicked deed,
In me even sleeping, did strange horror breed.
Richard the Third.

39.
In day time wheresoeuer I did go,
My watchfull eyes I whirled round about,
Fearing the onset of some sudden foe,
And to be out of dreadfull danger's doubt,
My bodie priuily was fenc'd about:
Upon my dagger still I kept my hand,
Readie to stab those that by me did stand.

40.
After the murther of my nephewes twaine,
Not long it was ere Buckingham and I
Began to iarre, for which my lawless seaaigne
Not long did last, his last conspiracie
Did end his owne life and my royaltie:
Who gag'd his honor t'helpe me to the crowne,
With his owne death did help to bring me downe.

41.
Of Hereford the dukedome he did claime,
Which was the chiefest cause of our debate:
For his pretended title to the same
Did touch the kingly title of our state,
For which his sute I spurn'd in spitefull hate,
And rated him with speeches minatorie,
Which was the fall of my usurped glorie.

42.
When thus the wrathfull duke did plainly see
His sute reiectd, and himselfe despis'd,
He cast how to aunenge himselfe on mee,
And in his thoughts my ruine he deni'sd:
In which a bold attempt he enterpris'd,
For he in battell bold himselfe did band,
Against me for to fight with force of hand.
Many with him against me did accord,
For when the sudden fame abroad was spread,
How noble Richmond that Lancastrian lord,
My brother's heire, Elizabeth should wed,
Many that were that often wisht me dead:
Vowing to spend their blood in Richmond's right,
And to assist the duke with all their might.

Then were commotions raised euery day,
The duke in Shropshire hard by Shrewsburie,
The proud wilde Welchmen troopt in battell ray,
Who vainly vaunted on their chivalrie,
As in the sequell they did testifie:
Yet their example many did excite,
To moue rebellion to my heart's despight.

In Yorke-shire marquesse Dorset with his crew,
Gainst me in field to fight were boldly bent,
In Devonshire both the Courtines did pursue
Those that my cause did fauour, and in Kent
The Guilfords were in armes for that intent:
Thus I in euery corner of this land,
Was round beset with force of foe-men's hand.

Yet from my youth in warre affaires being bred,
I knew that if in this conspiracie
I did without delay cut off the head,
The rest being stricken with timiditie,
Would soone be quell'd by force or pollicie:
Wherefore with all my power I did pursue
The duke of Buckingham and his Welch crue.
47.
He towards Glocester his way did take,
There to haue joyned with the westerne powre,
But as in safetie passage for to make,
He with his host by Seuerne's coast did scowre,
Heau'ns cloudie mountaines brake, and many a showre
   Through darksome aire, from heau'ns wide flound-gates fel,
   Which made the wombe of raging Seuerne swel.

48.
The shores did shrinke, the lustie waues did grow,
Trees hid their heads, dumbe beasts on hilles were drown'd,
Infants in cradles wandred to and fro:
Yea those that of the flound stroue to win ground,
Both men and horse the waters did confound:
   And to this day the Seuerne men by name,
   Stout Buckingham's great water call the same.

49.
Thus the bold duke was of his purpose crost,
Who of my swift approch, when he did heare:
In good array did range his warlike host.
But they, before in field we did appeare,
Turning their backes put on the wings of feare,
   Leading their duke the way, who thus distrest
   Durst not abide, but fled amongst the rest.

50.
Who tooke himselfe in his vnhappy flight,
Vnto his seruant's-house vpon the way,
Hight Humfrey Banester, a wicked wight,
Who foster'd by this duke did yet betray
His lord and master, to his lieue's decay.
   By him descri'd he in disguise was taken
   In a darke wood, of all his friends forsaken,
Richard the Third.

51.
He dead, the rest of his conspiracie
Dispers'd their powers, and each one fled his way,
Some fled to Richmond, then in Britannie,
And others here in England lurking lay,
Expecting the approach of that wish'd day,
When Richmond should on England's coast arrive,
Mee of my crowne and kingdom to deprive.

52.
But I, not slacking opportunitie
In this beginning of my good success,
Did studdie both by strength and policie,
Richmond's increasing powers to suppress,
Although in vaine; for heauen, his cause did blesse:
The people's loue did towards him incline,
Wishing in hart, that he might victor shine.

53.
To give content vnto my carefull minde,
One Peter Landois, cheefe of Britannie
Vnder the duke, with gold I did so blinde,
That hee did promise mee by policie
To bring the earle into my custodie:
The Britaine duke his friend did only stand,
To whom my subjects daily fled the land.

54.
This Peter was th'earle's onelie seeming frend,
And in pretence of loue, a warlike band
Of men at his owne cost he did commend
Vnto the earle, to be at his command,
When hee should purpose to invade this land:
But when towards England hee was in his way,
His purpose was that they should him betray.
Richard the Third.

55.
The earle reseru'd vnto more happie fate,
Informed was of this false treacherie,
Wherefore t'escape their hands, that lay in wait,
To take away his life, he priuilie
Did into Aniou fli from Britannie,
   To which as hee did fli in speedie haste
   With greedie pursuit hee was follow'd fast.

56.
But in a thick wood standing by the way,
He in his seruant's weedes himselfe did clad,
And caused him the master's part to play,
While hee himselfe fast by his side full glad
On foote did runne like a young lustie lad,
   Whereby at length hee past without mischance
   The British confines to the realme of France.

57.
Thither stout Oxford, his old hate to shoue
Vnto our house of Yorke, repaire did make,
To ioyne with Richmond my Lancastrian foes:
Then Brandon, Blunt and Cheynie did forsake
Me and my part, with Richmond part to take,
   Which newes my daylie dread doth so increase
   That I no houre can liue in restfull peace.

58.
To whom I myght giue trust, I did not know,
Since seeming friends from mee do daylie flie,
In court each one doth wish my ouerthrow,
In towne and citie every one doth crie
Shame on my deedes of death and tyrannie:
   Thus in my rule I liue belou'd of none,
   Dreaded of many, hated of euerie one.
Richard the Third.

59.
To my distresse some comfort to appie,
And that I may remove the onely thing,
On which earle Richmond's hopes doe most relie:
Now such strange mischiefe I doe set on wing,
That neuer age the like to light did bring:
Through blood to incest I intend to swim,
To breake the match betwixt my neece and him.

60.
For Anne my queene, great Warwick's daughter deere,
By poys'n's force I sent vnto the dead:
Which done, my troubled thoughts I vp did cheere,
In hope I might my brother's daughter wed,
And bring her vnto mine incestuous bed:
Foule sinne I now do feare in no degree,
That I from feare of Richmond may be free.

61.
Her mother queene (strange that it should bee so)
Wonne with faire words consents vnto the same:
Who forc'd by feare, or by distresse brought low,
In hope to raise her state againe (fond dame)
In vaine doth woe her daughter in my name:
Which heau'n abhorring hastens on my end,
And by my death prevents what I pretend.

62.
The royall virgin doth so much detest
My damn'd intent that I no grace can finde,
And daily newes my thoughts doe so molest
With foes inuasion, that my troubled minde
Is altogether vnto care inclinde:
Gains't those abrode that doe intend t'nuade,
While I prepare, at home I am betrai'd.
Richard the Third.

63.
At Nottingham, where then in court I lay,
Inform'd I was, that th' hated enemie
Had taken land, at which in much dismaie,
Turning my feare to rage, at last I crie
For vengeance on my sujects treacherie,
And forc'd to trie my cause by bloodie blowes,
I mustred vp my men to meete my foes.

64.
When that I heard where Richmond did arive,
I did digest my bands in battel ray:
In ranke forth marcht my footemen five and five,
Who in that order kept the readie way,
That led directly where earle Richmond lay:
Then wings of horsemen coasting euerie side,
Did vnto bloodie battell boldly ride.

65.
In midst of whom, vpon a tall white steede
Mounted I sat with cruell countenance,
Still crying out, march on, march on with speede:
And in this sort without incumberance,
To Leicester we forward did advance:
Through which we past to Bosworths ample plaine,
Where I did end my wretched life and reign.

66.
And there vpon an hill, Anne Beame by name,
I downe did pight my standard, and fast by
My campe in martiaal order I did frame:
Richmond fast by vs on the plaine did lie,
Next morne the chance of battell for to trie:
For it was euening ere we could attaine
To meete each other vpon Bosworth plaine.
Richard the Third.

67.
The sad night's cold forerunner Vesper faire,
Dispreades her golden lockes in easterne skie:
Then courts of guard are set with speciall care,
Lest that our foes aduantage to espie,
In ambusado neere should lurking lie:
And eery one with hearts to heau'n did pray
To scape the horror of th'approching day.

68.
The heau'ns that in eternall booke do keepe
The register, for life or deathes decree,
By vision strange did shew to me in sleepe,
That next daie's cheerefull light the last should be,
That in this world I euermore should see:
   As in my tent, on bed I slumbring lie,
   Horrid aspects appear'd vnto mine eye.

69.
I thought that all those murthred ghosts, whom I
By death had sent to their vntimely graue,
With balefull noise about my tent did crie,
And of the heau'ns with sad complaint did graue,
That they on guiltie wretch might vengeance haue:
   To whom I thought the Judge of heau'n gaue care,
   And gaue me gaue a judgement full of feare.

70.
For loe, eftsoones, a thousand hellish bags
Leauning th'abode of their infernall cell,
Seasing on me, my hatefull bodie drags
From forth my bed into a place like hell,
Where seends did naught but bellow, howie and yell,
   Who in sterne strife stood gaist each other bent,
   Who should my hatefull bodie most torment.
71.
Tormented in such trance long did I lie,
Till extreme fear did rouse me where I lay,
And caus’d me from my naked bed to fle:
Alone within my tent I durst not stay,
This dreadfull dreame my soule did so affray:
When wak’t I was from sleepe, I for a space
Thoughts I had been in some infernal place.

72.
About mine cares a buzzing fear still flew,
My fainting knees languish for want of might,
Upon my body stands an icy dew:
My heart is dead within, and with affright
The hair upon my head doth stand upright:
Each limbe about me quaking, doth resemble
A riuers rush, that with the wind doth tremble.

73.
Thus with my guiltie soule’s sad torture torne,
The dark nights dismay all hours I past away,
But at cockes crow the message of the morne,
My fear I did conceale, lest men should say
Our foes approach my courage did dismay:
And as dire need did me thereto constraine,
My troopes of men I marshall’d on the plaine.

74.
Who with swift concourse fill’d the smoathed ground,
And did enranke themselves in braue array,
The forward with bold bowmen did abound,
Commixt with pikes to bear the violent sway,
When on our front the foe should giue th’assay,
And to their forme in fight good heed to take,
John duke of Northfolke chieftaine I did make.
Richard the Third: 805

75.
After this vantguard I my selfe did goe,
And round about me chosen men of might
Did range themeselues to shield me from the foe,
Our skirts were lin'd with horse, and fit for fight,
Each place was stuf't with men in armes well dight:
   In this array I troopt my armed traine,
   To meete earle Richmond on the equall plaine.

76.
Who wisely did his folke to fight instruct,
John earle of Oxford did the vanward lead,
The right wing Gilbert Talbot did conduct,
The left wing sir John Savage, one that fled
From me to Richmond for to save his head:
   Richmond himselfe with Pembroke that stout knight,
   The middle ward did lead vnto the fight.

77.
As thus both hosts stood each in other's sight,
Expecting when the trumpe, whose blast doth breed
Courage in men, would call them forth to fight,
Arm'd in bright steele vpon a stately steed,
From ranke to ranke I rode about with speed,
   And fit for fight my soouldiers hearts to make,
   Hie, and with courage thus to them I spake.

78.
"Felllowes in armes, and my adventurious friends,
Give heedfull care to that which I shall say:
Be valiant hearted, thinke vpon the ends
Of fight or flight, of triumph or decay,
Both which the battell doth propose this day,
   Th'one of which doth bring eternall fame,
   The other ignomie and dastard shame."
Richard the Third.

79.
O think upon the matchlesse valiancie
Of our forefathers deeds in former daies,
And let vs counterchecke the memorie
Of their stout acts by that immortall praise,
To which our deeds our names this day may raise:
    Yea, let vs thinke against whom we come to fight,
The thought of which might cowards harts excite.

80.
First with our foe-men’s captaine to begin,
A weake Welch milke-sop, one that I do know
Was nere before for fight in battle seene,
Not able of himselfe as guide to goe
In marshall discipline against his foe:
    But backt by his consorts, a sort of slauers,
Against his will vs now in field he braues.

81.
And for his company, a sort they bee
Of rascall French and British runawaies,
People far more courageous for to flee,
Then stand in fight, whose faint hearts former daies
Could witnessse to our land and their diapraise:
    Who doubtlesse now shall by your valours die,
Or else at least from battell wounded flie.

82.
That bearing wounds vnto their native home,
Their fellows may be strucke with heartlesse dread,
Fearing in future times againe to come
Into our kingdome with bold banners spred,
Gainst souldiers that in England’s bounds are bred:
    Then courage, friends, think on renowne and fame
For which we fight, let cowards flie with shame.
Richard the Third.

83.

And as for me, assure your selues this day
I will triumph by glorious victorie,
Or win a lasting name for liue's decay:
Take then example by my valiancie,
And boldly fight against your enemie:
    You for your wives and goods, I for my crowne,
    Both for our countrie's good, all for renowne.

84.

Advance them capaines, forward to the fight,
Draw forth your swords, each man adreste his sheeld,
Hence faint conceites, die thoughts of coward flight,
To heauen your hearts, to fight your valours yeeld:
Behold our foes do braue vs in the field,
    Upon them friends, the cause is yours and mine,
    Saint George and conquest on our helmes doth shine."}

85.

This said, the dreadfull trumpet loude blewes,
To bring them forward to the furious fight,
Then did the bowmen bend their stift string'd bowes;
The soouldiers buckled on their helmets bright;
The bilmen shooke their bills, and euerie wight
    Did prove his fataill weapon on the ground,
    Ready prepar'd his foemen to confound.

86.

The archers drew, the fataill flight began,
Thick flew the shafts, many to death were done:
Which once being spent, close ioyn'd they man to man:
Then did sterne slaughter through the battell runne;
Not any one at first his foe did shunne:
    But equallie their heads they vp did beare
    In fight, not stooping vnto seruile feare.
Stout Norfolke in the forefront boldly stood,
Implying deeds of death against the foe;
Not fear'd, in midst of dust, of death and blood,
Th'extreamest of his utmost strength to show,
To winne his soueraigne's weale by his owne woe:
Where he, braue lord, by friends unkindlie left,
In manlie fight was of his life bereft.

For in my cheefeest hope to winne the day,
Appointed by the heauen's most just decree,
My soultiers in the forefront shranke away,
Which heanie newes declared was to mee
By one that counsel'd mee away to flee:
But I his counsell rashly did forsake,
And vnto him in furie thus I spake:

"Curst be thy coward thoughts that thinke on flight,
And curst those traytors that are fled away:
I am resolu'd in this daie's dreadfull fight,
To lose my life, or win a glorious day:
Flie those that will, for I am bent to stay":
This said, my plum'd deckt helme I downe did close,
And with my eager launce made toward my foes.

Hie was the furie of my desperate fight,
And like a tempest in a stormie day,
When I did see vnto my heart's despaign,
Where Richmond's standard stood without delay:
Through thr'armed men to it I made my way,
The which, with William Brandon that bold knight,
To ground I downe did cast in Richmond's sight.
Richard the Third.

91.
Many beneath my conquering strokes did fall,
Each one did flie from me with coward shame,
But one whom sir John Cheynie men did call,
Who for huge swinge of strength did beare the name
Of all the captains that with Richmond came,
    Who single did my charge at first repel,
Though in the end beneath my sword he fell.

92.
But as with him alone in fight I stood,
Behold with foes I was incircled round,
Who did imbrue their swords in my deare blood,
Where mastered with the smart of many a wound,
I bleeding fell vnto the dustie ground:
    Where cursing Richmond and his conquering crue,
Thence in disdainfull sort my sad sole flew.

93.
I being slaine, those that for me did fight,
Turning their backes, away forthwith did flie,
In field my slaughtered bodie in despight,
Drag'd from the place where it did bleeding lie,
Was naked made to every vassals eye,
    Despoil'd of all those kingly robes I wore:
Thus they to Leicester my bodie bore.

94.
Behind a slauce vpon a halting iade
All naked as I was, hog-like I lay:
And in that sort with blood and dust array'd,
To Leicester they bore me, whence that day
To fielde I came in pompe and rich array:
810 Richard the Third.

Where to the grave my bodie they commend:
Thus had my bloodie life a bloodie end.

95.

Th'ambitious prince, whose hand vniustly griptes
Another's right to make himselfe a king,
Suffers the smarte of many furies stripes:
Th' internall worne his conscience still doth sting.
His soule t'a fearefull judgement death doth bring:
Of which let my vsurped royaltie,
Remaine a Mirrour in this historie.

96.

My storie told, I may no longer stay,
My grieued ghost doth smell the morning's aire:
The night on sable wings flies fast away,
The hourcs in cast expecting daies repaire,
On cloudie hill sets vp her siluer chaire?
My guiltie ghost her light may not behold,
Adew, remember well what I haue told.

"Our night is at an end," quoth Memorie,
"With which we heere will end our historic:
After this tyrant's fall, that dismal night,
Which did obscure this kingdome's faire day-light,
Did take an end: heere some auspitious star
Twixt Yorke and Lancaster did end the iar,
Appointing Richmond that Lancastrian knight,
T' inoculate his Red Rose with the White:
Heere therefore with this blissfull vnitie,
We will shut vp our tragick historie,
Richard the Third.

And thou, whose pen we do appoint to write
Those Mirrors past, which thou hast heard this night;
Awake from sleepe, and let thy willing pen
Set forth this dreame vnto the view of men."
This said, with fame she vanisht from my sight,
This was the vision of a winter's night.

ENGLANDS

ELIZA:

OR

THE VICTORIOUS AND

TRIUMPHANT REGINE OF THAT

VIRGIN EMPRESS OF SACRED

memory, to England.

and Ireland.

AT LONDON

Imprinted by Felix Kyngston.

1610.
TO THE VERTVOVS

Ladie, the Ladie Elizabeth Clere,
Wife to the Right Worshipfull
Sir Francis Clere, Knight.

My muse, that whilome wail'd those Briton kings,
Who vnto her in vision did appeare,
Craves leave to strengthen her night-weathered wings,
In the warm sun-shine of your golden Clere:
Where she (faire ladie) tuning her chast layes
Of England's empress to her hymnicke string,
For your affect, to heare that virgin's praise,
Makes choice of your chast selfe to heare her sing:
Whose royall worth (true vertue's paragon)
Heere made me dare t'ingraue your worthie name;
In hope, that vnto you the same alone
Will so excuse me of presumptuous blame,
That gracefull entertaine my muse may find,
And euer beare such grace in thankfull mind.

Your Ladiship's euer humblie
at command,

RICHARD NICCOLE.
TO THE READER.

Gentle Reader, when I first writ this poem, I had thought for the length thereof to have distinguished it by section into cantoes or bookes: but since perswaded by the printer to publish it with this worke: it being, though no fall, yet a worthie MIRROR answerable to that of the empress Helena in the first part of this volume: I present it in one whole entire hymne, distinguishing it only by succession of yeares, which I have margented through the whole storie, and by an analysis of every chiefe exploit inserted in their proper places. For my quotation of authors, I heere use it not for singu-laritie, it being a thing not customarie to writers in this kind, but to confrme the truth of that which is written, as not being ignorant that I shall be bitten by those mongrel English (I can terme them no other) that barke at the maestie of that most noble princesse, against whose railing, an inseparable propertie to their profession, I only arme my selfe with this confidence, that the fame of her royalties mounting aloft like the sun verticall, shall in the height of all true borne English estimation, abate the shadowes of their enuie.

Farewell.
THE INDUCTION.

In that sad month, whose name at first begun
From Rome’s Augustus, great Octavius son,
When heau’an’s fierce dog, sterne Alhabor did rise
To bait the lion in th’Olympian skyes;
Whose hot fier-breathing influence did cracke
Our thirstie grandame Terrae’s aged backe:
By wrathfull Ioue, thicke darted from the skie
The thunder shafts of pestilence did flie:
In top of heau’n he tooke his weakfull stand
Ore that great towne vpon the northerne strand.
Of siluer Thamisis, vpon whose towres
Downe dropt his shafts, as thicke as winter’s showres,
Which daily did his indignation show
In euery place, dispersing worlds of woe:
Witness ye ghosts and spirits dolefull derry,
Vntimely sent by troopes to Charon’s ferrie,
Leauing your limbes wrapt vp in sheets of clay,
As dustie reliques of your liues decay:
Yea, thou sweet genius of that ancient towne,
Thou ladie of great Albion’s chiefe renowne;
Of that sad time a witnesse maist thou bee,
When death did take so many sonnes from thee;
Whose funerall rites inconsolate alone,
When thou vnkindly left, didst kindly mone,
Who staid with thee, alas, to helpe thee mourne,
And fled not from thee, leauing thee forlorne?
Mongst whom, though I, strooke terror-sicke with dread
Of heau’n’s hot plague, was one that from thee fled:
Yet of thy sight I daily did partake,
Which of thy woes a partner did me make:
Not far from off that slimie southerne strand,
By which with Isis, Thames runnes hand in hand,
In that high mountaine countrie's fruitfull soile,
That nere in fight of forren foes tooke foile,
Where those same famous stout men-moving wood,
Against the Norman conqueror boldly stood,
Was my abode: when foule infection's breath
In Troyounant implooy'd the workes of death.
There in this wofull time vpon a day,
So soone as Tython's loue-lasse gan display
Her opall colours in her easterne throne;
It was my chance in walking all alone,
That ancient castle-crowned hill to scale,
Which proudly overlookes the lowly vale,
Where great Elizae's birth-blest palace stands,
Gainst which great Thames cast vp his golden sands.
There when I came, from thence I might descrie
The sweetest prospects, that the curious eie
Of any one did euer elsewhere see,
So pleasant at that time they seem'd to mee:
It is a choice selected plot of land,
In which this ayrie mount doth towring stand;
As if that nature's cunning for the best,
Had choicely pickt it out from all the rest:
Beneath this loftie hill shot vp on high,
A pleasant parke impaled round doth lie,
In which the plaine so open lies to sight,
That on this hill oft times with great delight
That heau'ny queene, Plantagenet's great blood,
The faire Elizae's selfe hath often stood,
And seene the swift-foot dogs in eager chace
Pursue the gentle hinde from place to place.
Induction.

From hence recalling my weake wandring eye,
I gan behold that kingly palace by,
Whose loftie towres built vp of ancient time
By worthie princes, to the stars do clime;
Proud, that so many a prince to do them grace,
Beneath their rooffe had made their resting place.
Fast by this princely house, afront before
Thames gliding waues do wash the sandie shore,
Whose fruitfull streames with winding in and out,
Forcing their way through hollow lands about,
From th'occidentall with swift course do run,
Where Hesper bright brings vp the golden sun:
And on the siluer brest of this great lord
Of all the deepes, that Albion's wombe doth hoard,
Downe from the easterne seas I might descrie
Many swift-winged barkes, that seem'd to flie,
Cutting their passage through the threatning waue,
That 'bout their sides in vaine did rore and ranne;
With swelling sailes, not fearing sad mischance,
Each after other came in stately dance,
And nimblie capring on the purple wane,
With loftie foretops did the welkin braue,
Vutil they came vnto that stately place
Fam'd for the birth of great Elizae's grace:
To which they vail'd their towring tops before,
And from their sides the thundring cannons rore
Flew as a witnesse of their loyalty
And loue vnto that house of maiestie;
From thence full fraught with many a precious prise
They sail'd along, whereas the passage lies
To Troy nouant, whose pride of youthfull lust
The hand of death had smothered in the dust;
The smiling heau'n's, that with sweet sunshine howres
Did once vouchsafe t'adorne her hie topt towres,
Induction.

Now with grim looks, which did my heart appall,
Did seem to threaten her approaching fall:
Downe from their cloudie browes in threatning pride,
Death-darting pestilence did seeme to slide:
Grim-visag'd-like the grisly dreaded night,
In noysome fumes and mistie fogs bedight:
The aire once pure and thin, now wing'd with death
Grewe gloomie thick, being poysон'd by her breath,
In which, I thought, she took her horrid stand,
And with fierce look and stiff-bent bowe in hand,
She drew her shafts, impatient in her minde,
From forth her quyer at her back behinde:
Then did I thinke vpon the shreekes and cries
Of dying soules, that did ascend the skies
By thousands sent vnto the gaping graue,
On whom no mercie pestilence would haue:
Yea then (thou glorie of great Albion)
Thy sad distresse I gan to thinke vpon,
Thy mournefull widowes groueling in sad swound
On their dead husbands, on the ashy ground,
Thy husbands striuing to preserve the breath
Of their deare spouce from vnrelenting death;
Thy orphans left poore, parentlesse, alone
The future time's sad miserie to mone:
The thought of which, in that vnhappie season
With woefull passion did so maister reason,
That as I stood vpon that pleasant hill
To fancie sweet delight I had no will;
But seeking for some groue or gloomie wood,
Where I might feede my melancholie mood;
Vpon this hil's south side at last I found
Fitting my thoughts a pleasing plot of ground;
It was to wit, that wel knowne happie shade,
Which for delight the royall Britaine maid
Induction.

Did oft frequent, as former times can tell,
When her sweet soul in mortall mould did dwell:
It is a walke thicke set with manie a tree;
Whose arched bowes ore hed combined bee,
That nor the golden eye of heauen can peepe
Into that place, ne yet, when heauen doth weepe,
Can the thin drops of drizeling raine offend
Him, that for succour to that place doth wend.
Where, when alone I first did enter in,
And call to minde how that truth-shielding queene,
In former times the same did beautifie
With presence of her princelie majestie;
O how the place did seeme to mourn to mee,
That she should thence for ever absent bee!
In this sad passion, which did still abound,
I sat me downe vpon the grassie ground,
Wishing that heau'n into my infant muse
That antique poet's spirit would infuse,
Who, when in Thracian land bee did rehearse
Ianthee's wofull end in tragick verse,
Did make men, birds, beasts, trees and rockes of stone
That virgin's timelesse tragedie to mone:
For then I thought, that to that mournefull place,
I might haue sung my verse with lesse disgrace
To great Elizae's worth: for who doth bring
Her deeds to light, or who her worth doth singe?
O, did that Fairie Queene's sweet singer lie,
That to the dead eternitie could giue,
Or if, that heauen by influence would infuse
His heauenlie spirit on mine earth-borne muse,
Her name ere this a mirror should have been
Lim'd out in golden verse to th'eyes of men:
But m'ad muse, though willing, yet too weak
In her rude rymes Elizae's worth to speak,
Induction.

Must yeeld to those, whose muse can mount on high,
And with braue plumes can clime the loftie skie.
As thus I sat all sad vp on the greene
In contemplation of that royall queene,
And thinking, what a Mirrour she might be
Vnto all future time's posteritie,
Inclining downe my hed, soft fingered sleepe
With pleasing touch throughout my limbes did creepe,
Who hauing seas'd vpon me with strong hands,
Bound vp my thoughts in soporiferous bands,
And held mee captive, while his servant slie
A vision strange did vnto mee descrie:
For vp from Morpheus den a vision came,
Which were it sent in mightie loue's own name,
Or by some other power, I wot not well:
But as I slept, I say, thus it befell:
As at that time in walking to and fro,
I 'bout this pleasant place alone did goe,
Each object of the same all suddenlie
Seemd strangelic metamorphiz'd to myne eye;
The Helliconian spring, that did proceed
From th'hoofe of Pegasus that heauenlie steed,
And those pure streames of virgin Castalie,
The place of loue's nine daughters nurserie,
Did seeme to haue resign'd their proper place,
Transported thither to that land's disgrace:
Where, as I thought, I heard an heauenlie sound,
Of which the place did euerie where redound:
Vnto the which as I attentiue stood,
Descending downe from out a neighbouring wood,
I might behold the sacred sisters nine,
Whether from heauen or other place diuine,
I am vncertaine; but their way they made
Where as I stood beneath the leauie shade:
Induction.

Before them all a goodlie ladie came
In stately portance like loue's braine-borne dame,
To wit, that virgin queene, the faire Elise,
That whilom was our England's richest prize;
In princelie station with great Iunoe's grace
(Me seem'th) she came in her maiesticke pace,
Grac'd with the lookes of daunting maiestie,
Mixt with the meekenesse of milde clemencie;
Such haue I seene her, when in princely state
She goddess-like in chariot high hath sate,
When troopes of people with loud shoutes and cries,
Haue sounded out their auies in the skies:
And rid each other in the present place
With great desire to see her beaunly face:
Mongst whom she came, as if Aurora faire
Out of the east had newly made repaire,
Making a sun-like light with golden shine
Of her bright beauty in the gazer's eie.
Approching neere the place where I did stand,
With gratious beckning of her princely hand,
She seem'd to call to me; but sillie I,
Daunted with presence of such maiestie,
Fell prostrate downe, debaasht with reuerent shame
At sudden sight of so divine a dame;
Till she with gentle speech thus mildly said:
"Stand vp," quoth she, "and be no whit disdain'd;
Let loyal loye and zeale to me inflame
Thy muse to sing the praises of my name;
And let not thoughts of want, of worth, and skill,
Impeach the purpose of thy forward quill;
For though thy homely stile and slender verse
Too humble seeme my praises to rehearse:
Yet to the world, that I a Mirour bee
Amongst those many Mirours writ by thee;
Feare neither bite of dogged Theos's tooth,
Nor soone-shot bolts of giddie headed youth;
For th'awfull power of my sole dreaded name,
Shall from thy verse auert all foule defame:
And lest in any point thou chance to faile,
Which may my name's great glorie ought auail;
Loe here the cheefest of the daughters nine
Of sacred Memorie and Ioue diuine,
Great Clio's selfe, in order shall rehearse
My storie to thee in her stately verse."
This said, more swift then lightening from the skie,
She on the suddaine vanisht from mine eye
With all her nymphes, for none of all her traine
Excepting Clio did with mee remaine,
Who being the first borne childe of Memorie,
The ladie was of noble historie,
A peerlessse dame past al compare to sing
The deeds, that vertue vnto light doth bring:
In comelie garments, like some virgin maid
Of Dian's troope, shee trimlie was arraid,
Sane goddesse-like her globe-like head around
With verdant wreath of sacred bay was crownd;
From which downe either side her comelie face,
Her golden lockes did flow with goodlie grace,
And in her hand a lute diuinelie strung
She held, to which oft times she sweetlie sung;
With this she sat her downe vpon the ground,
And with her fingers made the strings to sound,
Vnto the which her sweet voice she did frame
To sing the praises of Etiusae's name.
Which hauing done, shee thus did silence break;
"Would God," quoth shee, "her prayses I could speak,
Who claires a greater power her praise to sound,
Then Phoebus self, if greater could be found:
Induction.

Yet will I triall make with all my might,
With her great fame the golden starres to smite:
Which while I sing, heark thou with heedful ear,
And in thy mind the same hereafter beare:"
This said, she lightlie toucht each trembling string,
And with sweet voice did thus diuinelie sing.
ENGLAND'S ELIZA.

1.

When England's Phoebus Henrie's hopeful sonne
The world's rare Phoenix, princely Edward bright,
To death did yeeld, his glasse of life outrun,
And Phoebus-like no more could lend his light:
Then men did walke in shades of darksome night,
Whose feeble sight with errors blacke strooke blind,
Could in no place time's faire Fidessa find.

2.

That blind borne monster, truth's sterne opposite,
Begotten first in Demogorgon's hall,
Twixt vglie Erebus and grislie night,
The sonnes of truth did horriblie appall
With her approach, much dreaded of them all:
Who euer came in reach of her foule pawes,
She in their blood imbru'd her thirstie iawes.

3.

Witnesse may bee the manie a burning flame,
Made with the limbes of saints to mount on high,
Whose constant soules without the least exclaime,
In midst of death downe patientlie did lie,
And in bright flames did clime the clow'd-brow'd skie:
Yes, let Elizae's woes in that blind age,
A witnesse bee of bloodie error's rage.
England's Eliza.

4.
Whose deepe distresse and dolefull miserie,
I not assay to sing, but leaue the same
To our deare sister sad Melpomene,
That she her sweet pathetick voice may frame
In dolefull dittie to condole the same:
   I onely here in high heroick streine,
Do struie to sing of her triumphant reigne.

5.
Ione looking downe, from his celestiall throne
With eies of pitie on poore England's woes,
Did lend her helpe, when hope of helpe was none,
And in his mercy did his power oppose
Gainst error's night-borne children, her cheife foes,
   Who sought t'obscure with cloudes of enuious night,
Her Cynthia's shine, the lampe of all her light.

6.
But he dispersd those cloudes, and drove away
The lowring stormes, that overcast our skie,
And made our glorious Cynthia to display
Her heauenlie shine, to guie them light thereby,
Who long before in darknesse bound did lie:
   For she it was, who with her sweet repaire
From th'hearts of men did banish black despaire.

7.
Even as that morning starre that doth display
Her golden tresses in th’orientall skie,
Brings happie tidings of approching day
To them, that long in bed do restlesse lie,
Expecting comfort from the sun’s bright eye:
   So our Eliza did blest tidings bring
Of ioy to those, whom sad distresse did sting.
England's Eliza.

8.
No sooner did this empire's royall crowne
Begirt the temples of her princelie hed;
But that Ioue-borne Astrea straight came downe
From highest heauen againe, to which in dread
Of earth's impietie before shee fled:
Well did shee know, Elisa's happie reigne
Would then renewe the golden age againe.

9.
The beau'ns did smile on her with sweet delight,
And thundering Ioue did laugh her foes to scorne,
The god of warre did cease from bloodie fight,
And fruitfull plentie did her land adornne
With richest gifts, powr'd from her plenteous borne,
The happie seedes, which th'hands of peace did sow
In euerie place with goodlie fruit did grow.

10.
Devouring Mulciber, whose flames before
With blood of holy men were heard to hisse,
Of England's happie sonnes were seene no more:
But truth and mercie did each other kisse,
And brought sweet tidings of their heauenly blisse:
All which by powerfull Ioue haue granted been
For Ioue t'Elisa, Albion's matchlesse queene.

11.
Matchlesse for all the gifts of heauenly grace,
For nature's good and happie destinie,
All which, in one sole subiect hauing place,
If they a mortall wight may beautifie,
And give a prince earth's true felicitie,
She truly did enjoy, while she did liue,
That sumnum bonum, which this life could give.
England's Eliza.

12.
In th'happie horoscope of her sweet birth,
Both heauen and nature seemed to consent
With fortune's selfe t'augment their fame on earth,
Each one in hope to perfect their intent,
By this queene virgin and her gouvernment,
And 'mongst themselues, they seemed to contend,
Who should to her the greatest gifts extend.

13.
For when from Annas wombe, she came to light,
Th'whole aggregate of heau'n from Ioue's high throne,
Vnto the lowest orbe lookt blithe and bright,
And in the same, each constellation
Vnited was in sweet coniunction,
Powring their influence of felicitie
Vpon the virgin's blest natuuitie.

14.
Nor can I tell the gifts of grace exact,
With which heau'n did enrich her royall mind,
Had I a brazen throat or voice infract,
A thousand tongues, and rarest words refin'd,
With vitterance swifter, then the swiftest winde;
Yet were they all too weake at large to tell
The gifts of grace, that in her soule did dwell.

15.
Her settled faith, fixt in the highest heau'n,
Remained firme vnto her liue's last date,
Nor her vndanted spirit could be driuen
At any time one iot thereof t'abate
By Spaines sterne threats, and Rome's pernicious hate,
The ankor of the same, her hope, aboue
Stood fixt vpon the promise of great Ioue.
16.

Her deeds of mercie, not in hope to merit,
Were true ostents of her fidelitie,
For which a name on earth she shall inherit
Which shall outlive the vading memorie
Of spitefull Rome’s defaming forgerie;

For not alone did we her bountie know,
But forren shores the same likewise can show.

17.

Heau’n hauing dignifi’d her soule diuine,
With rarest gifts of goodly qualitie,
Dame nature’s selfe, as seeming to refine
The common mixture of mortalitie,
Into a matter of more puritie,

Made for her soule a mansion house so faire,
That few with it for beautie might compare.

18.

And though her beautie were exceeding rare,
Yet Rome’s Lucretia for a sober eie
So far renown’d, with her might not compare,
Nor the Greekes constant queene Penelope,
Might match this maiden queene for modestie:

For Phoebe’s selfe did want her gouernance
In modest gesture and chaste countenance.

19.

Thus heau’n and nature hauing shew’d their skill
In perfecting a creature so diuine,
Fortune, as loth so rare a worke to spill,
At our Great Britaine maid did not repine,
But did to her all happinesse assigne,

Whereby no prince on earth yet euer was,
That for rare gifts Eliza did surpasse.
England's Eliza.

20.

Cease then, yee black-mouth'd brood of enuie's race,
Men monsters like, or monsters like to men,
Whose tongues with scandall tipt, seeke to disgrace
Our royall soueraigne, loue's anoynted queene,
Whose like in any age hath seldome been:
   Cease vipers, cease I say, from your offence,
   In spitting poysson at such excellence.

21.

Yet, if your English Romanized hearts,
Gainst nature's custome swell with foule defame,
Brandish your stings, and cast your vtmost darts
Against the greatnesse of her glorious name,
Yet shall it liue to your eternall shame;
   Yea, though Rome, Spaine, and hell it selfe repine,
   Her fame on earth with sun-bright light shal shine.

22.

And while that we, the brood of Phœbus wit
In golden verse her deeds to light can bring,
On mount Parnassus, as we safely sit,
In such high straine her worth we all will sing,
That earth's whole round of her great fame shall ring;
   For endless praise to her well may we give,
   That did protect our cause, while she did liue.

23.

O, how the wreath of Phœbus flowring bay,
The victor's due desert, and learning's meed,
Did flourish in her time without decay!
Which to obtaine, each one did strue t'excel
In high atchieuement of some glorious deed:
   Though now, alas, such custome is forgot,
   And loue of ease great Albion's sonnes doth blot.

vol. 11. 5 O
Lull'd in the bosom of securitie,
Vpon th'ignoble bed of idle ease,
Foully defacing true nobilitie,
Few now do care, but how they best may please
The hungric fancie of sweet loue's disease,
That pitie 'tis so many a worthie wight,
Let's honor flie for fancie's fond delight.

But wake, yee honor'd impes of noble race;
Rouse vp the dying sparkes of courage bold,
'Tis Clyo speaks to you, that she may place
Your lasting praises writ with lines of gold,
In flying fame's great booke to be inrol'd,
Yea let your father's late done deeds inflame
Your sleeping thoughts to gaine a glorious name:

Who thought it not true honor's glorious prize
By nimble capring in a daintie dance,
To win th'affects of women's wanton cies,
Ne yet did seeke their glorie to advaunce
By only tilting with a rush-like lance,
But did in dreadfull death themselves oppose,
To winne renowne against Eliza's foes.

How stoutly did they march in honor's field,
In stately station like the sonnes of fame,
Led by renowne, who nere did let them yeeld,
Though drown'd in death in midst of martiall game,
Till by their deeds they gain'd a glorious name,
Whose valour still Eliza did direct
Each where to beat downe wrong and right erect.
England's Eliza.

28.

When England's Scotland in distress did stand,
Ambitious Guise intending her decay,
England's faire virgin lent her helping hand,
And soon did chase th'insulting French away,
That proudly did their ensignes there display:
For that braue lord great Grey of Wilton hight,
Did force them thence by warre's impulsue might.

29.

When France within it selfe diuided stood,
Th'aspiring Guise in hostile furie bent
Against braue Condie, prince of royall blood,
Then our faire queene all danger to preuent,
Great Warwicke ore the seas broad bosome sent,
Whose dreaded powers our Calice losse had quited,
Had heau'n not sickness through his host excited.

30.

When Ireland's great Oneale, first that did move
The Kernes and Gallowglases, men of might,
Into their soueraigne to renounce their lone,
Hight Henrie Sidnie that heroick knight,
Did oft times turne him to inglorious flight,
Till traytor-like mongst friends he found his fall,
Who hew'd his bodie into pieces small.

31.

Nor heere renowned Randol braue esquire
Can I forget to glue to thee thy right,
When with thine owne few troopes, whose hearts on fire
Thy valour set, thou put'st to shamefull flight
This Shame Oneale, and all his host in fight:
Where though thou fell in venturing past the rest,
Thy name shall live in fame's great booke exprest.
England's Eliza.

32.

As. Reg. 12. And here at home, when in the north did rise
The louring storms stim'd vp by discontent
Of peace-disturbers, who did enterprize
By force of hand their soueraigne's right to rent,
And take from her this kingdom's government,
    Then stood vp many a loyall hearted peere,
    To shield her safe from threatening foe-men's feare.

33.

For well they knew, with right it could not stand,
That any one their soueraigne might displace,
And take the scepter from the prince's hand:
The rule of many is absurd and base,
One prince must sit inthon'd in justice place;
    For many heads, what bodie euer bare,
    That was not monster like and out of square?

34.

Which little did those iarring members know,
When with their banner of the five wounds spread,
And holy-seeming crosse, a fained show
Of their vngodly zeale, they first made head
At Durham's towne against their soueraigne dread,
    Where their first outrage men did vnderstand,
    In tearing th'holly writs of God's owne hand.

35.

Gainst whom, these great Heroes vp did stand,
Renowned Sussex, th'eldest sonne of fame,
Great Warwicke, Rutland, and stout Cumberland,
Bold Deuorax, Howard lord of Effingham,
Brane lord of Perham Willowby by name,
    Scroope, Euers, Knoles, all men of famous might,
    From whom their foes to Scotland tooke their flight.
England's Eliza.

36.
And thou brave Hunsdon borne of prince's blood,
Though last in place yet not the least in name,
When a disloyall lord vndaunted stood,
To bid thee battell, to thy endlessse fame,
Thou mad'st him flie the bounded field with shame:
  'Gainst whom with thy few troopes, thou didst aduance
  And authoriz'd high servise with thy lance.

37.
Upon the bankes, where siluer Chelt doth glide,
With his three thousand men in armes well dight,
He stoutly stood and did thy charge abide,
Gainst whom with fiftene hundred thou didst fight,
And forc'd him yeeld vnto thy powerfull might:
  For heartlesse from the field away he fled
  To Scotland by, to hide his shamefull hed.

38.
And as the lordly lion, king of beasts,
When he by chance hath lost his wished prey,
Runs roaring through the wood, and neuer rests
Till he haue truly tract the readie way,
Where he may follow his escaped prey:
  So noble Hunsdon with his conquering crew,
  His flying foe to Scotland did pursue.

39.
With that stout sonne of Mars, great Sussex bent,
Tinferre reuenge vpon the borderers by
For misdemeanor done, much time he spent
In making hostile spoile on th'enemy,
That sought to succour rebels treacherie:
  Which done, loden with honor and rich spoile,
  They made returne vnto their natiuue soile.
England's Eliza.

40.

Thus did these lords to their faire virgin queene,
Returne with glorie got from every place,
Though at her greatnesse with malignant spleene,
Many leau'd sonnes of enuie's hellish race,
Did much repine, and sought her name's disgrace:
   For spitefull enuie never doth repine,
   But where true vertue's glorie most doth shine.

41.

Downe in the deepes of earth's profunditie
Her dwelling is in dungeons darksome blind,
Where she nere sees the bright sunne's cheerefull sie,
Ne comfort of the wholesome aire doth finde,
Tost to and fro by gentle breathing winde;
   But with the furies of the Stygian flood,
   Sits low in hell in hate of humane good.

42.

The restlesse griefe, which carking care doth breed,
Her thoughts with endless torment doth oppresse,
Her woes of other's welfare do proceed,
Ne euer is she seene to laugh, vnlesse
At lucklesse hap of other's ill successes;
   For other's happinesse her woe doth bring,
   And all her ill from other's good doth spring.

43.

To this foule helhound from that blood built towne,
Which Tybur's siluer armes doe round imbrace,
Blind error came, where truth was troden downe,
Since bloodie Phocas to the world's disgrace,
Did set the first false priest in Caesar's place;
   And thence did error take her speedie flight
   To enuie's caue to worke the world despight.
England's Eliza.

44.
Where when she came before the bags foule sight,
Elizae's glorie she did oft propose,
And more to whet her forward to despight,
She shew'd how truth and loue their two chiefe foes,
On that faire virgin only did repose,
Which enuie's malice did so much augment,
That she throughout the world with error went.

45.
Blinde error bore foule enuie on her backe,
And ouer many kingdoms tooke their flight,
Where enuie's poison mixt with errors blacke,
In scalding drops, as they did flie, did light
Vpon the limbes of many a wretched wight,
Which through their veins diffus'd did swiftly ran,
Choaking that loue, that in their hearts did won.

46.
At length to Rome with error, enuie came,
Where gorg'd with fulnesse of excessiue feast,
Finding proud Pius, fift of that false name,
Laid on soft couch his heanie head to rest,
She laid her scruie fist vpon his brest,
And from his feet, even to his sleepe head,
She made her poison canker-like to spread.

47.
And with more malice to augment his hate,
She did propose vnto his enuious eye,
Th'admired glorie of Elizae's state,
And his lost pruiledge and dignitie
In this her kingdome of great Britanie;
Which did so vex great Pius, that on nought,
But mischiefe gainst our queene thenceforth he thought.
48.

His threatening bull, whose rore in ages past,
The superstitious world did terrifie,
Amongst Eliza's subjects he did cast,
Thereby to alienate their loyalty,
And duty vow'd to her soveraigntie;
Yea pardon in it he did denounce to all,
That from our queen their duty would recall.

49.

An. Reg. 19. Which bull, fond Felton, thy unhappy hand
Did fixe vpon that prelate's palace gate,
Which doth by Paul's high towering temple stand;
Where thou didst justly meet thy wretched fate,
The meed that traytors steps doth still await;
Nor could that priest remit thy foule offence,
Though with large sinne his bull did then dispence.

50.

And though he did denounce both pardon and curse,
Yet by the one small comfort didst thou find,
Ne yet was England's happy state the worse;
But as in gloomy causes and corners blinde,
The sun's bright blazing beams most cleare we finde;
So did the virgin's glorie shine most brim,
When her proud foes did seek the same to dim.

51.

An. Reg. 15. For hereupon, when with rebellious sword,
Those stout strength-breathing Irish vp did stand,
Renowned Deuorax vicount Hereford,
That most illustrate lord of high command,
No sooner did approach with powerfull hand,
But that the rebels daunted with his name,
Armes laid aside, in humble manner came.
England's Eliza.

56.

O what a princely charge did she mainaine
Of men, munition and artillirie
In flying castles on the purple maine,
Which on the clouds of Thetis liquid skie,
Seeming to frisk about for iollitie,
      Stood like safe centinels 'bout England's shore
Making seas tremble at their cannous rore.

57.

Thus did the heau'ns showre downe felicitie
In ample manner on Elizae's state,
At which Rome's holie sire did still enuie,
Who failing in our English home-bred bate,
In foraine shoares shew'd his malignant hate:
      For by false Desmond's meanes he made great show
Against our Elizae's weale to worke much woe.

58.

Anno Reg. 22. But heau'n did soone oppose against his might
Th'heroick spirit, that burned in the hart
Of noble Grey of Wilton, that bold knight,
Who vnto wounds did challenge th'aduerse part
In manie a field, who hauing felt the smart
    Of his keene sword, the stoutest hid his hed,
    And from his furie to the wilde woods fled.

59.

And when th'Iberian troopes did there display
Rome's ensigne, in that castle hight Del Ore,
In Desmond's cause against our queene, great Grey
Did thunder against their walls with cannons rore,
Ne would from fierce assault desist before
    Vnto his furie passage he had made
    In Spanish blood to bathe his conquering blade.
England's Eliza.

60.
Thus all his plots still failing in th'euent,
Prevented by heau'n's all foreseeing eye,
A thousand mischieves now he gan inuent,
Invasion, outrage, murder, treacherie,
Sounding the depths of all iniquitie;
For all blacke deedes his vice-blackt thoughts could find,
He turn'd and return'd in his vengefull minde.

61.
Vpon his furrowed front, the signes of ire,
Furie and rage, did sit like lowring night,
And both his burning eyes like glowing fire
Beneath his bended bowes did sparkle bright,
As irefull lightnings of his heart's despight,
Yea nought could mollifie his raging teene,
But blood and vengeance against our royall queene.

62.
Amongst his holie sonnes he cald a quest,
Whose counsell to his mischiefe might giue way,
And to his raging thoughts at length giue rest,
Setting his wrath on wing against that day,
Wherein he purpos'd England's swift decay;
For by them all in counsell 'twas decreed,
England should fall, Elisae's hart should bleed.

63.
The time was set by stratagems devise,
And force of hands to worke their wicked hate,
The persons chosen for that enterprise,
All bent to tread downe England's happie state
Beneath the feete of some disaster sate,
Bosting abroad before the deed was done,
By their firme valor, what rich prize was won.
The conquerd nations of the Indian ayde,
At whose barge wealth the world is made to wander,
Their mother's wombe were forced to dispayle,
And rudely read her golden ribes in sunder,
Thereby to set on wing warre's roaring thunders:
For soildiers thoughts on golden wings sitt far,
And earth's rich spoiles are snareses of the war.

Manie tall pines were leucd with the plaide
By the confedrates of the Latin shore,
Being taught to sile upon the purple maine
By force of winde and strengthe of sable care,
That on the solid ground stood firme before,
Whose hugenesse mightie mountaines did resemble,
Making the monsters of the depe to tremble.

The famous arizans, that by their art
Do imitate the thunder of the skie,
And digging downe into the earth's black hart,
With that salt humor, that doth hidden lie,
Into the ayre make sicrie lightnings sile,
Were all impoy'd by Spaie's supreme command
To hurl their thunder against our sea-sieg'd land.

All warre habiliments they did prepare
To set sterne Mars vpon his conquering feete,
Their farre-sought Indian gold they did not spare,
That nothing might be wanting, that was meet
To furnish out their most vnconquered fleet;
Before all which was consummate and done,
Bright Phoebus oft his yearly race had ruus'd.
England's Eliza.

68.
Meane time Rome's dragon rounde his bloodie crest,
And wa'd his wings, from whence that rabble rout,
That hell-hatch'd brood, who, fed on error's breast
And suck'd her poysenous dugs, came crawling out
As was their woont, to sco the world about:
For those he hatch'd beneath his shadie wings,
'T'impoy 'gainst potentates and mightiest kings.

69.
Manie of these to England's shores he sent,
All diuerse attir'd in strange array,
Closely thereby to worke his foule intent,
And by their presence to prepare a way
Against the enterprize of that great day;
In which Spaine's potent fleete the world's great wonder,
With hидious horror should gainst vs enthunder.

70.
Most of the which (O that time's swan-white wings
Could sweepe away record of such foule shame)
Where home-born impes, vatiemly shot vp, springs
Of Britaine brood, Britaine's alone by name,
By nature monsters borne of foule defame,
That sought the raine, shame, decay and death
Of their deare dam, from whom they took their breath.

71.
Unkindly impes, even from your birth accurst,
Detested stock of vijer's bloodie brood,
That sought to satsisfie your burning thirst
By drinking vp your dying mother's blood,
Making her death your life, her hurt your good;
Your deeds are sunke to Plutoc's darksome den,
Shame is your portion mongst the sonnes of men.
England's Eliza.

73.
Mee seemes, I see them walk about the brims
Of blacke Styx dangerous flood, where Dee doth weane,
Prince of dead night and darknesse gloomie grim,
Howling for passage, where deep Styx doth run,
Although in vaine, their funerall rites not done:
For hatefull fowles of beas'n being their best grame,
No passage to Elysium can they have.

74.
Alas, how error, enuiie and despaire
Did troope them vp to leade them on the way,
Error orecast their skie, darkened their ayre,
Obscar'd their sight, then enuiie did away
To make them seeke truth's ruine and decay;
Which hauing failed, despaire to them did bring
Confusion, shame, and conscience griping sting.

75.
In fatall barkes fast flying ore the maine,
They daylie came with doctrine seeming sound,
In which as meritorious they maintaine
The bloodie hand that should his prince confound,
If good thereby to holy church redoun'd,
Aboue all whom the self-conceited Campian
Past all compare, was reckn'd Rome's arch champian

This English Romane wretch with manic more
Did spred themselues disguis'd about the land,
Seduing daylie both the rich and poore
Against their prince to lift rebellious hand,
Renouncing as vnjust her dread command,
And 'gainst the time appointed to provide
With forren force to set vp Romane pride.
England's Eliza.

76.
And then with dread and horror to dismay
Their waiving thoughts, they set before their eyes
The general slaughter of that dismal day,
When Spain's black fleet on Neptune's liquid skies
Should woeful England suddenlie surprise;
Wishing them crave the pope's protection
T'escape such horror and confusion.

77.
But as the wofe disguis'd with fleecie skin
Of sillie sheep, the shepheard long did blinde,
And 'mongst the flock thereby did credit win,
Till he at length, did by his bloodie minde
Bewray himselfe to be a wofe by kinde:
So they, though making manie saint-like showes
Did by their deeds themselves at length disclose.

78.
With shamefull death, their shamefull lines took end,
Leauing on earth for signes of infamie
Their totter'd carcasses, to which no friend
At anie time, could giue due obsequie,
Or scarce bewaile their woefull destinie;
But left they were for prey, both daies and nights
To black night rauens and to hungrie kites.

79.
Which might haue been a terror vnto those,
That after sought the faire Elizae's fall,
And in their harts did wickedlie suppose
To England's bounds againe back to recall
The popish pride and Romane slauish thrall:
But after this did manie vndergoe
Dire death and shame, to worke Elizae's woe.
England's Eliza.

80.

Anno Reg. 26. First furious Sommerside, that posting came
With his owne hands to act his soueraigne's death,
Prevented in the way, to shun such shame
As might ensue, did stop his owne deare breath,
Thinking the same a far more glorious death;
But simple man with far more shame thereby,
Thy trembling ghost vnto the dead did sile.

81.

As sodem.
F. [rancis]
T. [hrogmorton]
The next, whose shame no time away shall sweepe,
Was he, who by the helpe of traytory's hand,
Searching the mighty Neptune's waterie deepe,
Vuln all his art and skil to vnderstand
The depth of euery bauen in this land;
Thereby to give safe conduct to the foe,
And bring them in to worke his countrey's woe.

82.

He went to that great God's dread kindeome's bounds,
Who often chargeth on the clouds in skie,
Who cufes the seas, who by his power confounds
High bils and mountaines, who doth terrifie
Even the sad ghosts of Plutoe's emperie;
He went to know what winde the fleet should wing,
That should confusion vnto England bring.

83.

O, vnremorsefull man! O, wretched wight!
Shame to thy selfe and thy posteritie,
Nor friends nor countrey's good, to whom of right
Thy care was due, nor loue of loyaltie
To thy dread queene thy heart might mollifie,
But wing'd with mischief, having once begun,
Thou to vntimely death didst head-long run.
England's Eliza.

84.
Whose wretched steps, in that same fatall way
That leads to house of death, loe many more
Had follow'd fast in giusing like assay,
Had not our queene, whose virgin bosome bore
A melting heart admir'd for mercie store,
In pitie far excell'd th'impietie
Of their false treason 'gainst her maiestie.

85.
Out of her bountious grace and princely mind,
She gauze them passage at her owne expense,
Seldom on earth such mercie shall we find,
For which strooke blind with shame of their offence,
Against a person of such excellence,
They sent their owne hand writs to testifie
This worthie deed to all posteritie.

86.
Yet that vngratefull man, to whom before
Justly conviccted for foule felonie,
Renown'd Eliza did lost life restore,
Sought to enact a bloodie tragedie
Upon the person of her maiestie,
To wit that boaster who did beare the name
Of doctor Parrie to increase his fame.

87.
The Babylonian bawd, whose strumpet-breath
Gives life to treason, did with him conspire
To end their vengeance in the virgin's death;
And lest his heart should faile and he retire
From his intent, to wing him with desire,
His soule from sin, from death, and hell was freed,
With impious hands to act this tragick deed.

vol. ii. 5 Q
The foolish man with resolution came,
As sent from heav'n, yet did it nought availe:
For getting licence to this royall dame
With her to talke alone, his heart did faile,
Her lookes alone his height of sprite did quaille;
For daunted with her sight, he did repent,
And closely sought to colour his intent.

He did declare to her, how he had taken
A solemne oath to take her life away,
And how her soueraigntie he had forsaken,
The Romish beast as supreame head t'obay,
Who by his hands expected her decay,
To which, he said, he did but seeme t'agree,
That so it might by him detected bee.

The royall virgin, when as she did heare
The wicked purpose of her treacherous foe,
To shew how little she the same did feare,
Pardon'd him in secret, that no peere might know
His leaud intent, and so might worke him woe:
O height of princely spirit, past humane sense!
O mercie past compare, for such offence!

Yet this false wretch, in whose obdurate heart
No loyall loue did dwell, persisted still
In his blacke treason, and did use all art
Oft times with dagger, dag or any ill,
To effect the purpose of his bloodie will:
Which once being brought to light for such offence,
His grudging ghost with shame was posted hence.
England's Eliza.

92.
Thus Rome's blood-thirsting wolves with cruell paws,
Sought daily to devoure our virgin lambe,
And plunge poore England in death's yawning iawes,
Hiding for aye the glorie of her name,
Rakte vp in cinders of a ruthlesse flame:
Thereby t'extinguish that celestiall light,
Which Rome's red dragon did so sore affright.

93.
They knew for certaine, while our glorious lampe,
Our maiden queene did liue to lend vs light,
She would disperse foule errors dismall dampe,
Which suffocates the soule, and choakes the sight
With searefull shadowes of eternall night;
Yea much they fear'd pure truth's true light diuine,
Which then in forren shores began to shine.

94.
The seadiuided seuentenee lands great nation,
The Belgick borderers by the bankes of Rheine,
Cast of Rome's yoke, and left their blind deuotion,
With one consent beginning to incline
Vnto a truth more perfect, more diuine;
Which they with martyr'd blood did long maintaine,
Gainst th'inquisition of Rome-wronged Spaine.

95.
But at the last, when with warre's dreadfull thunder,
Don John of Austria and his warlike band,
Began to shake the Belgicke state in sunder,
To tyrannize and bring them with strong hand
Beneath the yoke of Philip's sterne command,
The great Eliza they did humblie craue,
Their Belgick state from hostile spoile to saue.
England's Eliza.

96.
The Briton maid, remorsefull of their woes,
In their defence did lift her royall hand,
Against the threats of their invading foes,
And sent in safe conduct a warlike band,
With fame-grac'd Norrice to the Belgicke strand;
Which with his valiant crew he did maintaine,
Against the incursions of the power of Spaine.

97.
Meane time th' undaunted Drake no time did sleepe,
Upon the maine king Philip's powers to sease,
Who thought himselfe the Neptune of the deepe;
But of such yoke, the sea-gods sonnes to ease,
Drake tooke from him the scepter of the seas,
And put the same in his faire soueraigne's hand,
Teaching the deepe to know her milde command.

98.
Her winged barkes, like sea-nympes in their flight,
The aged sea-god's daughter safely bore,
Whose nimble dance the deepe did so delight,
That 'bout their bosomes sweeping by the shore
The siller waues did play with wanton rore,
Thinking themselues releas'd from yoke of Spaine,
Whose gold-heap'd mountaines did oppresse the maine.

99.
With these vpon the seas, the noble Drake
Did saile as lord of th'ocean emperie,
At whose dread name th'iberians hearts did quake,
Who left the rule of Neptune's moistned skie
To Drake's command, and to the shores did fli,
Whom now for ancient wrongs done long before,
He with swift vengeance follow'd to the shore.
England's Eliza.

100.

Brave Carlile, Winter, Frobisher and Knoles,
With many more of Neptune's noble race,
Made peopled cities place for beasts and fowles,
Burnt bowers, sackt towers, raz'd townes before the face
Of their base foes, who fled with foule disgrace,
    Leaung wife, children, gold and goods for pray,
    By stranger people to be borne away.

101.

Foure townes in this their voyage they did foile,
First did Saint Iago by their power decline,
That done, then Saint Domingo did they spoile,
Next towring Carthagena, and in fine
In Terra Florida, Saint Augustine:
    Thus fortune with rich spoile their deeds did crowne,
    And home they came with glorye and renowne.

102.

And while these valiant men, true sonnes of fame,
In forren shores our foe-mens force did quell,
And by their deeds made knowne Elisae's name,
The stif-neckt Irish proudly did rebell,
Whose hearts with stubborne pride did euer swell:
    But noble Bingham, that illustrate knight,
    Did bring them downe and tame their towring might.

103.

When that false traytor, Mahowne Obrion
To Rome's proud strumpet bound his loue to show,
In Thomond with rebellious hand began,
To stirre vp strife, and worke his countreys woe,
In hope to haue been backt by forren foe,
    In warre affaires this Bingham far renown'd,
    In castle Clanowen did him confound.

An. Reg. 36.
Taken from a note confirm-ed vnder the hands of di-sters gentle-
men employed in this action.
England's Eliza.

104.
And when the Burkes, who did false rumours noise
Of wrong intended gainst their countries good,
With Clangibbons, with Clandonnels and Ioyes,
Themselves in armes did bound and proudly stood
On daring tearmes in field to spend their blood,
Renowned Bingham with his valiant crew,
Did them through woods from cause to cause pursue.

105.
And when the Redshankes on the borders by
Incursions made, and rang'd in battell stood
To beare his charge, from field he made them flie,
Where fishie Moine did blush with crimson blood
Of thousand foes, that perisht in the flood,
For which braue Bingham crown'd with endless fame,
Enjoyes on earth a never dying name.

106.

Although these ciuill warres of home-bred hate,
First hatcht at Rome by England' ancient foe,
Did much disturbe Elizae's blessed state,
Yet did the royall virgin not forgoe
Th' afflicted Belgians drencht in depth of woe:
But to support them gainst all foes annoy,
For that designe, she Dudley did employ.

107.

Who, Jason-like to Colchos island bound
To fetch the golden fleece by force of hand,
With many great Heroes far renown'd,
Past with triumphant sailes ore seas and sand,
From England's shores unto the Belgick strand,
Where after all their high achieuements done,
Their fleece was fame, their gold was glorie won.
O, noble virgin! O, victorious dame,
England's Bellona, nurse of chivalry!
What age brought forth so many sons of fame,
In all the world's thrice-changed monarchie,
As in the time of thy great empery?
Whose deeds from England's bounds did beare thy name,
As far as Phebus spreads his golden flame.

Who now arriving on the Belgian coast
With fatale steele did deepe ingraue thy name,
Upon the proudest crests in that great host
That with the valiant prince of Parma came,
Enacting wonders for immortall fame;
Witness those famous deeds by Zutphen done,
Where many high exploits were vndergone.

When both the adverse powres afront did meet,
Although the foe farre more in number were;
Yet did our men with Mars swift-winged feet,
Charge on their troopes, whose hearts strooke dead with feare,
Unable to resist, they taceke did beare,
Whom valiant Audie in their saint recoyle,
With his foot-bands alone did gue the foyle.

Then th' Albanois vnto the rescue came
With their horse troopes, amongst whom stout Norris went,
And boldly singl'd out a man of fame,
Gainst whom his pistoll with full charge he bent
To act his fall; but failing in th'euent,
His foe-man's head he with the same did greet,
And made him fall at his victorious feet.
England's Eliza.

112.

Is. Will. of Essex.

Next noble Willoughby with lance in rest,
Arm'd like the god of warre on winged horse,
Met captain George, opposing breast to breast,
Whom from his steed halfe dead with furious force,
He downe did beare in his winde-winged course,

This he spake in French.

Who falling said: "I yeeld me to thy might,
In that I see thou art a seemly knight."

113.

Rob. Earle of Essex.

Then noble Deuorax, Mars his youngest sonne,
Chear'd vp his troope, "Fellowes in armes," saith he,
"The honorable prease let vs not shunne,
Ne with the dread of death dismaied be,
But for your countrie's glorie follow me:"'
Which said, he fiercely charg'd on th'enemie,
And shew'd high profse of his stout valiancie.

114.

Sir William Russell.

To second him, Russell that martiall knight,
Like feathered shaft sent from a stiffe-bent bow,
Or boysterous Boreas in his nimble flight,
With weightie lance did charge vpon the foe,
And horse and man to ground did overthrow,
Who with affright did from his furie runne,
As braying goats the king of beasts doth shunne.

115.

Amongst them all, that impe of honor's bed,
That worthie of the world, that hardie knight,
The noble Sidnie to aduentures led
With glory-thirsting zeal in death's despight
Vpon his foes himselfe did noblie quight:
   For in one skirmish with high valiancie,
   Thrice did he charge vpon the enemie,
England's Eliza.

116.
But cursed fortune, foe to famous men,
Beholding Sidnie's deeds with envious eie,
Turning her malice into raging teene,
With deadly shot did wound him on the thigh,
Which from a foe-man's fatall peece did lie:
Whose timelesse end, if time did serue thereto,
I should bewaile in lines of lasting woe.

117.
Many more sonnes of Mars his noble race,
In this daie's fight great fame with perill wonne,
Yea many high exploits each breathing space,
By many a worthie wight were vndergone;
Mongst whom that deed with resolution done,
By valiant Williams, and the Belgin Skinke,
Downe to oblivion's den shall never sinke.

118.
For when that well wall'd towne, which Venlo bight,
Was round about begirted by the foe,
Huge spirit and high conceit did so excite
Stout Williams' mightie mind, to vndergoe
Some great attempt, that he full bent to show
Proofe of his valour by some famous act,
With hardie Skinke this wonder did enact:

119.
When grizly night her iron carre had driuen
From her darke mansion house, that hidden lies
In Plutoe's kingdome, to the top of heau'n,
And with black cloake of clouds muffling the skies,
With sable wings shut vp all wakefull eies,
Obserued with darknesse grim they both did go,
To act this stratagem vpon the foe:

Vol. 11. 5 R
Huylt were the winds, the aire all silent was,
Sad was the night, in skies appear'd no starre;
Yet through darke horror dardlesse did they passe,
And listning vnto every breach of aire,
With stealing steps this dangerous worke did dare,
Whom at the length the dark night's shadic wing,
Into the foe-men's campe did closely bring.

Where, when they came, the utmost watch they found
Vpon the ground all carelessly dispread,
Who tir'd with toile, lay in deepe sleepe fast drown'd,
And as they slept, each one secure of dread,
His weapon had fast fixed at his head,
Mongst whom, like hungrie wolues on flockes vnkept,
Stout Skinke and worthie Williams boldly stept.

Then death triumpht in slaughter of the slaine,
Soules stragling in the pangs of many a wound,
Departs in grieue and makes aire sigh againe,
Swords blusht with blood, grim horror did abound,
A crimson dew stood on the grassie ground;
Disorder, dread, death, noise and darkness grim,
In blood and gore of slaughtred foes did swim.

By the still watch and two strong courts of gard,
Through death, through blood and armes they boldly went,
Untill they came, where horriblie they scar'd
The prince himselfe sweet sleeping in his tent,
Whom in their power they long'd to circumuent,
Where many a noble wight fast snoring drown'd,
In deepest sleepe with death they did confound.
Englond's Eliza.

124.
But as their swords they in their foes did sheath,
At last, through massacres, through shrikes and cries
Of sad soules groining in the pangs of death,
On every side the startled foes did rise,
And shrikt out thicke alarmes to shun surprise,
   Crying arme, arme, whereby appall'd with feare,
   Th'whole host in sudden throgs all gathered were.

125.
Then fled the valiant Skenke, blacke death to shun,
But hardie Williams in contention stood
With his great mind, if he more fame t'have won,
Should stouly stay, and hazard his owne good,
With slaughtering sword to shed more foe-men's blood:
   Whereby at length in depth of danger drown'd,
   By armed foes, he was incircled round.

126.
But by advantage of the gloomie night
Amongst the foe-men's troopes, vnknowne he goes,
And cri'd: "Where's Williams? where is Williams hight?"
To whom againe one answer'd amongst the foes,
   "Pursue, pursue with speed, before he goes:"
   Thus cloudie night this worthie wight did saue,
   Who shun'd his foes, and fled his darksome graue.

127.
These were the foster children of that nurse,
Englond's Minerua, queene of glorie bright,
Who through the paths of warre their way did force,
In armes to get true honor's meed by might,
And grace their name with title of true knight:
   Which honor'd order only vertue's meed,
   Each one then purchas'd by some glorious deed.
England's Eliza.

128.
But while these captaines wedded to renowne,
True loyall subjects of a royall queene,
On Belgian shores their soueraigne's head did crowne,
With conquering wreath of neuer vading greene,
In spight of spight for aye fresh to be seene,
Rome's raging Python full of furious wrath,
Did once againe belch vp his poisoned froth.

129.

Anno eodem
28.

Foureteene false traytors from darke treason's den
He vp did call, foule clues of envious night,
Rebels accurst, monsters abhorr'd of men,
Who for the black fleet now alreadie dight,
To passe th'vnfruitfull deepe with all her might,
Should make fit passage against that dreadfull day,
By their sweet prince and countrie's swift decay.

130.

Ballard, first author in this villanie,
Sent from the triple-crowned sonne of night,
To put in practise this their treacherie,
Proud Babington and Sauage did excite,
With vremorsefull hands of violent might,
To spoile and ruinate their countrie's good,
And bathe their swords in their deare soueraigne's blood.

131.

Babington made choice
of the six.

Six resolute and bloodie minded mates,
Should haue been actors in her tragedie,
Then the graue peeres and honorable states,
Had been the slaughter of their butcherie,
And thou, O, glorie of this emperie!
Thy loftie towers been louell'd with the plaine,
Thy nauie burnt, and many a thousand slaine.
England's Eliza.

132.
Such dismal deeds and black confusion,
By proud Rome's twice-seven sons intended were Against the time of that invasion,
Report whereof with terror and with fear,
Swift-winged fame about the world did bear;
But high heau'n's King, who for his servant chose
Our virgin queen, their drifts did soon disclose.

133.
Their plot bewray'd, each one did seek escape,
Vengeance pursuing them from place to place,
Hight Babington attir'd in rusticke shape,
With walnut-leaves discolouring his face,
Did seek escape sad death and foule disgrace:
And all the rest being clad in strange disguise,
With trembling fear did seek to shun surprise.

134.
As guiltie homicides, that in dead night
Pursu'd for tragick deeds of dismal death,
To woods and groves dispers'd, do take their flight,
Whose gloomy shade they trembling stand beneath,
With fainting knees, cold spirit and panting breath,
With fear, expecting at their backes behind,
The pursuit made at every puffe of wind:

135.
Even so these wretched men, whose selfe-doom'd souls,
Now prickt with deepe remorse, did daily looke
To be the spoile and prey of hungrie fowles,
From place to place their couert passage tooke,
Whose hearts the thought of death with horror shooke,
Untill surpriz'd at length, victimly death
To end this fear expir'd their fainting breath.
England's Eliza.

136.
Of whose surprise, when as the trumpe of fame
Had blowen the blast, the subject euer giuen
To blesse the fate of so diuine a dame,
For this so strange escape did morne and even,
With praises magnifie the King of heau'n,
Imploring still his gratious hands for helpes,
Against the danger of that dragon's whelpes.

137.
That day was held diuine, and all the night
Consum'd in peans to th'Olympian king,
Then crown'd they cups of wine, and with delight
At sumptuous feasts did sit, while belles did ring,
And sweet voic'd minstrels round about did sing,
Whose suppers sauour wrapt in clouds on high,
The friendly winds blew vp into the skie.

138.
And as the siluer moone in calmest night,
When she in shining coach the skies doth scale,
As golden starres, that in the heau'ns shine bright,
When gentle Auster blowes a pleasing gale,
Do glad the shepherds in the lowly vaile:
So many thousand flames, that glas'd the skies,
Did at that time glad all true English cies.

139.
But most of all, that plentious peopled towne,
Elizae's best belou'd, faire London hight,
Her mistresse rare escape with ioy did crowne,
Whose loftie towers thrust vp themselves in sight,
And ioy'd to glitter in the golden light,
Affrighting sore sad night's black drowzie dame,
With splendor of huge fires refugent flame.
England's Eliza.

140:
This joy once past t'auenge that villanie,
Which Rome did by this bloodie plot pretend,
Against Elisae's sacred majestie,
The aged sea-god's backe, Drake did ascend,
And towards the foes wing'd with revenge did wend,
Mongst whom his name had been the gassy bug,
T'affright yong infants at the mother's dug.

141.
His fleet transferr'd, with prosperous gale did sweepe
Through parted waues of Thetis watterie skie,
Vnto the shores of the Castilian deepe,
In whose proud billowes he did wafting lie,
Vntill for truth he heard by his espie,
   Of that prepare, that in Cales harbor lay,
   For Spaine's Armada against th'appointed day.

142.
Then gave he order for the narrall fight,
And in the evening tide, when setting sun
Leaves steepe Olympus to the darksome night,
The pine-plough'd seas with black clouds ouerrun,
To give the onset valiant Drake begun:
   Hurling forth burning flames with hidious rose,
   Of brazen cannon on th'Iberian shore.

143.
And as, when Boreas in a tempest raues,
Leaping with wings of lightning from the skie,
Makes clouds to crack and cusses the swelling waues,
Who from the storme of his fierce furie flie,
In roling billowes on the bankes fast by;
   So wrapt in clouds of smocke and lightning pale,
   With dreadfull fight, Drake did his foes assaile.
England's Eliza.

144.
Six gallies thwart the towne at first did stand
The violent onset, which the English gane;
But had they with strong oares and readie hand,
Not made swift speed themselves and fleet to sauc,
They with the same had perisht in the wane;
For Drake with fire in hand without delay,
Had burnt their ships and sunke them in the sea.

145.
But loe a richer prize, he soone had wonne,
Which did repay that losse with trebble gaine,
Three barkes, of which each bore a thousand tunne,
And in the deepe such compasse did containe,
Seeming like floting mountaines on the maine,
With cannons wounding shot he did intombe,
With all their men in Thetis watrie wombe.

146.
Nor yet could this his noble heart suffice,
But with more conquest to renowne his name,
Thirtie eight ships his valour did surprise,
Of which most part with fire he did enflame,
The rest he kept for trophies of his fame,
Which in the sight of Cales that loftie towne,
He brought away in triumph and renowne.

147.
And as a bellowing bull, that doth disdaine,
Amongst an heard of cattell grazing by,
That any other bull in all the plaine,
Should proudely beare his curled head on high,
But makes him basely yeeld, or fainting flie:
So did great Drake, as lord of all the deepe,
His foes on th’ocean in subiection keepe.
England's Eliza.

148.
And when of all great Philip's nauall might,
On the seas wildernesse none durst appeare,
Drake to prouoke his heartlesse foes to fight,
With his whole fleet vnto the shore did beare,
Where three strong holds by him assaulted were,
    With that faire castle of Cape Sacre hight,
    All which did fall beneath his nauall might.

149.
From thence to seas with his triumphant sailes
He did returne, wafting vpon the waues
Before hight Lisbone, neere to easterne Cales,
Where of th'Iberians he the combate craues,
Though none amongst them durst interrupt his braves,
    But fled into the ports and harbours by,
    Where out of danger they might hidden lie.

150.
Yet thence he rouz'd them, while that heartlesse knight,
The marques of Saint Cruz lay wafting by
In his swift sayling gallies, in whose sight
Drake burnt and spoil'd his ships and made them fli,
Who to his care for helpe did seeme to crie:
    Yet durst he not come forth in their defence,
    But suffred Drake to lead them captiue thence.

151.
A hundred ships with furniture full fraught
For Spaine's Armada, that world-wondred fleet,
He did dispoile, and some away he brought
As signes of victorie, which as most meet
He did subiect at faire Elisae's feet;
    The praise of which with humble zeale and loue,
    She offred vp to heau'n as due to Ioue.
England's Eliza.

152.
Such humble thoughts in such a noble mind,
Do beat downe pride in chiefe felicitie:
And such a noble mind in kingly kind,
With best advice, doth teach true maistrie,
To shew it selfe in milde humilitie,
Such humble thoughts, such noble minde had she,
Which in her heart, heart-searching loue did see.

153.
For which in spight of her death-threatning foes,
As high as heau'n, he did exalt her name,
And did his blacke death-darting hand oppose
Against her brauing foes, that proudly came
With all their power against such a royall dame,
Whose mighttie fleete, fifteen yeares worke of wonder,
Now launche't into the seas began to thunder.

154.

For now loue's helm'd-deckt sonne, the god of warre,
Rouz'd from his rest with cannons dreadfull røre,
Leapt on the earth from out his iron carre,
Shooke his strong lance, steept in blacke blood and gore,
Whose brazen feet did thunder on the shore,
The noise of which that from the earth did bound,
Made all the world to tremble at the sound.

155.

And vp from darkesome lymboe's dismall stage,
Ore Stygian bridge from Plutoe's emperie,
Came night's blacke brood, Disorder, Ruine, Rage,
Rape, Discord, Dread, Despaire, Impietie,
Horror, swift Vengeance, Murder, Crueltie,
All which together on th'Iberian strand,
With Spaine's great host troopt vp did ready stand.
England's Eliza.

156.
Fame downe descending from her siluer bower,
On duke Medina's huge black barke did stand,
The generall of all the Spanish power,
Whence looking round ore seas, and sea-sieg'd land,
Holding her siluer trumpet in her hand,
   The same she sounded loud, whose echo shrill,
   With sound thereof the wide world's round did fill.

157.
Then all th'Iberian kings stout men of warre,
Renown'd for those replendent armes they bore,
Marching beneath his ensignes heard from farre,
Who vowing England spoil'd of all her store,
Should stoope her pride, and them outface no more;
   Made swift repaire in concourse and thick crow'd,
   To Spaine's black fleet t'effect what they had vow'd.

158.
The sun-burmt Spaniards from that Indian shore,
Subdu'd by Ferdinandoe's bloodie hand,
Where Perue's streames cast vp her golden ore,
And Zeneve's waues bring to the slimie strand,
Pure graines of gold amongst the ruddie sand,
   Like Cadmus bone-bred brood came thicke in swarmes,
   As newly borne from top to toe in armes.

159.
The captiu'd nations of the Castile king,
Luxurious Naples and proud Lombardie,
Their troopes in faire refugent armes did bring,
And those of Portugale and Scicilie,
With slick-hair'd youth of wanton Italie,
   T'auenge faire England's foule supposed wrong,
   To Spaine's Armada in thicke troopes did throng.
160.

Readie t'imbarke vpon the shores they stood,
Like flowers in spring, that beautifie the plaine,
Or like May flies overwhelmed by the flood,
As infinite, as leaves or drops of raine,
Powr'd from the heau'ns vpon the liquid maine,
That with their weight, dame Terrae's aged backe
Beneath the sway of horse and foot did cracke.

161.

And as blacke swarmes of ants with loaden thies,
Hauing vpon the flowrie spring made pray,
In number numberlesse with fresh supplies,
Climbs some steepe hillock, and through all the day
By thousands in thick flockes do fill the way;
So Spaine's great host from trampled shores did wend,
In thronging troopes, their mountaine ships t'ascend.

162.

And such a blustering as against the shore,
When as the swelling seas the welkin braues,
Or storme-driuen billowes on the bankes do rore,
Or such a noise as in earth's hollow caues
We often heare, when stormie Boreas raues:
Such clamorous noise out of the tumult sprong,
When they from shores unto their ships did throng.

163.

Hous'd in their fleet, their ankors vp they weigh'd,
Hoisted their top-masts with their sailes on high,
The misen then with winged winds displaid
Before their hollow keeles, that low did lie
Within the deepe, made parted billowes fife;
Their huge big bulks made Neptune's back to bow,
And waues to swell vpon his waterie brow.
England’s Eliza.

164.
Their towring heads, the heau’ns blacke clouds did kisse,
Borne by the winde-driuen stormie waues on high,
Their hollow bosomes in the deepe abyssse
Amongst the surges of the fish-full skie,
Like mightie rockes from sight did hidden lie,
   Whose brasse-arm’d sides such compasse did containe,
   They seem’d to couer acres on the maine.

165.
Whoso had seene them on the gulphie flood,
He would haue thought some Delos now againe,
Some towne, some citie, or some desert wood,
Or some uew unknowne world from shores of Spaine
Launcht off to seas, had wandred on the maine,
   Peuled with those, that like quicke sprites in skie,
   By little hold-fast all about could fie.

166.
Each barke, whose bulke was proofe against the wound
Of common shot, besides those buls of brasse,
Whose bellowing rore did equall thunders sound,
Of such great thicknesse and high building was,
That like large towers they on the deepe did passe;
   For scarce could brazen cannons banefull thunder,
   With battering bullet beat their sides asunder.

167.
Their uppere deckes, all trim’d and garnisht out
With sterne designes for bloodie warre at hand,
With crimson signts were armed all about,
And on the hatche many a goodly band
Deckt in braue armes, together thicke did stand,
   Whose plume-deckt heads themselves aloft did show,
   And seem’d to dance, with windes wau’d to and fro.
168.
With glittering shields their bosomes they did bar,
Each one well brandishing his fatall blade,
And from their bright habiliments of war,
Such blazing shine, as in the gloomie shade,
We often see by Phæbus beames displaid,
   A splendor vp into the aire did throw,
   And glittered on the glistening waues below.

169.
Their top sailes, sprit sailes, and their misens all,
Their crooked sternes, and tackle evry where
Adorned were with pennons tragicall,
Which in their silken reds did pictur'd beare
The sad ostents of death and dismall feare,
   Who while their keeles through seas did cut their way,
   In wanton wauing with the winde did play.

170.
The clangor of shrill trumpes triumphant sound
And clattering horror of their clashing armes,
Vpon the bordering shores did so redound,
That even the deepe of their intended harmes
On England's coasts did sound out thicke alarmes,
   Which strooke a terror to the heart of him
   Who then did border about Neptune's brim.

171.
So great a fleet, since that same god so old,
Grim-bearded Neptune bore the sea-gods name,
The golden eye of heau'n did nere behold,
Nor Agamemnon's thousand ships, that came
To sacke proud Troy, and all her towers enflame,
   Nor that Eos monarch's fleet, that scar'd
   The sonnes of Tyre, with this might be compar'd.
England's Eliza.

172.

But while this mightie fleet did proudly boast
Her matchlesse might on Neptune's high command,
Braue Parma, lord of all th'Iberian host,
Both of the horse and foot, that came by land,
Did troope them vp vpon the Belgicke strand,
To whom th'assistants of the Castile king,
Their seuerall troopes of men did daily bring.

173.

Beneath the bird of Ioue the prince of ayre,
Which th'house of Austria in their ensignes bore,
The proud Burgundian marcht in armour faire,
Th'Italian, Germaine, Dutch, and many more
Of other lands and language, who before
Had often been renown'd in many a fight,
For their high valour, and approved might.

174.

Such, and so mightie bands of famous men,
Adorn'd in richest armes of purest gold,
Vpon those coats before hadnever been,
Nor any Belgian euer did behold
Such martiaall troopes vpon that trampled mold,
So skill'd in habit of all fights in warre,
And for fights true direction past compare.

175.

Both horse and foot of Spaine's impetuous might,
And of the auxil'arie bands, that came
As mercenaries for the bloodie fight,
Distinguishing under guides of speciall name,
Whom hope of spoile did to this warre inflame,
Drew towards the shores of Neptune there to meet
And ioyne their forces with the nauall fleet.
England's Eliza.

176.
Which being titled long before in Spaine,
The fleet Inuincible by all consents,
In all her pride now floted on the maine,
Readie prepar'd t'effect those blacke events,
Presag'd before by proud Spaine's sad ostents;
Who by report through all the world had won
The name of conquest ere the fight begun.

177.
The threatfull subiects of the Castile king,
In this huge fleet did such firme hope repose,
That all their sun-burnt brats they taught to sing,
Triumph and conquest, which they did suppose
Their very threats would purchase gainst their foes,
Who like braue lords, their valour to renowne,
Did cast the dice for faire Elizae's crowne.

178.
Much like the vanting French, when John of France
In Poyctiers battell with his mightie host,
Not pondering in his mind warres doubtfull chance,
The gotten victorie did vainely boast,
Before that either part had won or lost,
Where braue prince Edward with his troope so small,
Renown'd his sword with John of France' his fall.

179.
Euen so this brauing fleet, whose dreaded name,
Ineuptable ruine did foretell,
Thought, that the faire Eliza, who did frame
Her life in happie daies of peace to dwell,
Unfurnisht was such forces to repell,
And therefore sent as from king Philip's hand,
A sterne inscription with this proud command:
England's Eliza.

180.

"With auxil'arie bands she should no more
Vphold the Belgian gainst king Philip's frowne,
All Spaniah prizes back againe restore,
Build vp religious houses beaten downe,
And vnto Rome subject her selfe and crowne;
   All which to do, if that she did withstand,
     Her imminent blanke end was now at hand."

181.
The noble queene, who in her royall hand
Did beare the state and stay of Britanie,
In deepe contempt of such a basse command,
With spirit of princely magnanimitie,
Did briefely answere this proud ambasie:
   For in proverbiaall words her answere was,
     "Ist hae ad Gracas silent mandata Kalendas."

182.
An answere worthie, for the grace it bore,
The virgin spring of old Plantagenet,
Who from the foes to shield her native shore,
Her subjects hearts for light on fire did set,
And their bold stomackes did with courage whet,
   Who fir'd with loue of their Etisae's good,
     In her defence did thirst to spend their blood.

183.
For when for certaine, fame th'intended harms
Of Spaine's blacke fleet to England's shores did bring,
How gladly did her people flocke to armes,
And when the trumpe warre's scathfull song did sing,
About their cares how pleasing did it ring?
   Whose hearts with furie fed, to battell giuen,
     With braue conceits did leape as high as beaun.
All townes did ring with sudden cri’d alarumes,
Whence with loud clamour to the marine shore,
The armed people clustred in thicke swarmes,
Where red-ey’d Eris warre’s blacke ensigne bore,
And mongst their troops did sprinkle blood and gore;
  Stirring them vp with eager minds to wade
  Through seas of blood, the aduerse fleet t’inueade.

And as the golden swarmes of black-backt bees,
Their thighes full loaden from the flowrie field,
With humming noise flie to the hollow trees,
Where they with busie paine fit shelter build,
Their treasure and themselves from barme to shield;
  So thicke in armes, th’alarum once begun,
  Vnto their ships with shouting they did run:

Where with their mutuall strengths they did assay,
To hale Elisæ’s fleet from off the shore,
Some pumpt, some cleans’d, some drew the stockes away,
Some hoist the top-masts, some great burthens bore,
The nauie’s want with furniture to store:
  And with their utmost diligence all wrought,
  Till to perfection they their worke had brought.

Which from the shores, once launcht into the maine,
Not all the world a fairer fleet could show:
For though in huginesse, that black fleet of Spaine
Did farre surpasse; yet was it farre more slow
In nimble stirrage wafting to and fro:
  For England’s fleet through seas swift passage won
  With gentle gale, though th’ocean smooth did run.
England's Eliza.

188.
To shun their foes, each like a nimble hinde
In Neptune's forest, on the watrie greene,
Have skipt from wave to wave, and with the winde,
When they list turne againe; they have been seen
Like raging lions in their heats of spleene,
Fie on the Castile fleet to bring them vnder,
And with fell rore to teare their sides in sunder.

189.
All readie furnisht wafting to and fro,
Ouer the narrow seas deepe sandie beds,
They 'bout the coasts themselves did daily show,
In th'huuffing winds wauing their silken reds,
And crimson crosses on their loftie heads:
Those ancient badges, through the world renown'd,
Which with high conquest fortune oft hath crown'd.

190.
Their braue demeanor did so much delight
The people, that beheld them on the maine,
That many more all readie for the fight,
Did make repair, t'oppugne the fleet of Spaine;
Then all that royall nauie could containe:
Such feruent loue vnto their souveraine's name,
With fierie courage did their hearts enflame.

191.
Those stout sea-searchers of the stormie flood,
The sonnes of Nereus broad sea-sayling race,
And the braue offspring of Prometheus brood,
That with loud thunder-claps their foe-men chace,
Who in Eliza's royall fleet had place,
Made solemne vows, backe to returne no more,
Except with conquest to their natuie shore.
192.

Mongst whom the noblest obiect of them all,
That in the fleete did hold supreamest sway
Went honor'd Howard, as chiefe admirall,
Who by his stout demeanor did essay,
With courage bold to lead them on the way,
And every heart did fill with hautie spirit,
By glorious deeds immortall fame to merit.

193.

Vpon th'Eolian gods supportfull wings,
With chearefull shouts, they parted from the shore,
While heau'n and earth and all the ocean rings
With sounds, which on her wings loud echo bore,
Of trumpets, drums, shrill sifes and cannons rore,
To which the people's shouts on shores fast by,
Reccho'd in the rockes with loud replie.

194.

While they aboard at sea, so heere at home
T'auert all harms, all subject did prepare,
In mightie tumult to the murmuring drumme,
The multitude did make repairre from farre,
To trie their valour in th'approching warre
Thirsting to meete their foes on equall ground,
All hoping in their fall to be renown'd.

195.

With ornaments of warre, the earth did flow,
Glazing the skies with armes resplendent light,
And every place in aire, shot vp did show
The blood-red crosse, which did conduct to fight
Many faire bands, all men of powerfull might;
For both of horse and foot, from every shiere,
Thicke squadrons daily did in field appeare.
Engla\'nd's Eliza.

196.
Th'appointed place of generall meeting was
In Essex, on the coast at Tilburie,
To which the people in such troopes did passe,
That with their traine the shores they multiplie
Like Palamedes birds that forme the Y,
When cloud-like in thicke flockes their flight they take
Ore Thracian woods, to Strymon's seven-fold lake.

197.
There pight they downe their tents t'oppose all harmes,
Set vp the royall standards all about,
The faire supporters of Elisae's armes,
The rampant lion, and the dragon stout,
And th'ensigne of Saint George, which many a rout
Of Mars his noble race with conquering hand
Hath famous made, in many a forren land.

198.
Vnder whose colours like a leauie wood,
The host in seuerall bands digested all
Inrankt about with shot and pike-men stood,
As firme for battell, as a brazen wall,
Who to the workes of death did thirst to fall,
Infiam'd in heart with burning fire to fight
For England's virgin, and their countrie's right.

199.
Well did each horse-man teach his horse to run,
To stoope, to stop, to turne, to breake the field,
Well each bold musketier did use his gun,
Each launceer well his weightie launce did wield,
Each drew his sword and well addrest his shield,
Teaching each other by this braue array,
How on their foes they best might give th'assay.
England's Eliza.

200.

The sound of sifes, of drums, and trumpets shrill,
And mutuall exhortations for the warre,
All fainting hearts with manly sprite did fill,
And th'armed horse, that smell the fight from farre,
Inraged that the curbing bit should barre
Their forwardnesse, with neighing loud did cri
For present combat gainst the enemie.

201.

Thus in the field the royall host did stand,
None fainting vnder base timiditie,
But readie bent to use their running hand
Against the force of forren enemie,
If they should chance t'arriue at Tilburie:

Earls of Leicester.

Mongst whom great Dudlie bore supreamest way,
Against their foes to lead them on the way.

202.

And as the daughter of the mightie lone,
When from the browes of heau’n she takes her flight
Downe to those sonnes of Mars, whom she doth lone,
In her celestiall armes with glorie dight,
To bring them dreadlesse to th’approching fight;

Rich. Haklitt,
and Sow in his Annales.

So England’s empress, that undaunted dame,
Into the campe in glorious triumph came.

203.

Like noble Tomyris, that queene of Thrace,
Deckt in rich vestiments of shining gold,
Upon a snow-white steed of stately pace,
Mounted aloft she sate, with courage bold,
And in her hand a martial staffe did hold,
Riding from ranke to ranke, and troope to troope,
To whom with reverence all the host did stoope,
England's Elizd.

204.
Her comely gesture, and her angel's face,
The lodge of pleasure, and of sweet delight,
Did make the soildiers thinke some heauenly grace
Had left Olympus, and with powerfull might
Had come from Ioue, to cheare them vp for fight,
   Her presence did with such high spirit inspire
   Their manly breasts, and set their hearts on fire, 205.

And as Bunduca, that bold Britaine dame,
When ore this land proud Rome did tyrannize,
Her Britaine's heart with courage to enflame,
Amidst their troopes all arm'd in seemely wise,
Did Pallas-like a pythic speech devise:
   So our faire queene, bold spirit to infuse
Through all the host, these princely words did vse:

206.
"Captaines and soildiers, men of worthie fame,
And most admitted to our princely lone,
Thinke, what it is, to win a soildier's name,
And fight the battells of the mightie Ioue,
With safe protection from his power aboue,
   Faint thoughts from your stout hearts be farre expell'd,
   And feare of foes with courage bold be quell'd.

207.
If that the foe dare set his foot on land,
We with the best all danger will out dare,
And step by step with you in person stand,
To be a partner with you, in that share,
Which God shall giue vs, be it foule or faire:
   Then by my side like loyall subiects stand,
   And Ioue assist vs with his powerfull hand."
England's Eliz.

206.
This said from ranke to ranke, she rode about,
Enabling their endeavours for the fight,
And with sweet words from their bold breasts blew out
All fainting spirit, and did their hearts excite
With ready hands, to use their utmost might:
Which royal gesture of so faire a queen,
Would have inspir'd a coward's heart with spleene.

209.
Thus having cheer'd the common soldier,
The cloudie euen began to shut vp day:
Wherefore she backe return'd from Tilburie,
And towards that martiall field did take her way,
Where as that other royall armie lay,
In which did march the nobles of the land,
In rich array, each with his severall band.

210.
Troop vp there were in that same strong-arm'd host,
Fortie three thousand perfect in the frame
Of every fight, who of that time may boast,
And crowne inscription in the booke of fame,
T'haue been the guard of so divine a dame,
Who for her person only chosen were,
Martiall'd by Hunsdon that true hearted peer.

211.
But while the noble queene her selfe appli'd
T'oppose the foe, that should her state assaile,
Loe, from the Groyne the blacke fleet was descri'd,
Who now befriended with a gentle gale,
For England's rokke bounds did make full sail,
Of whom chiefest captaine Flemming first had sight,
And fled before them with industrious flight.
England's Eliza.

212.
At Plymouth port where th'English fleet did lie,
He with full saile came in, and cri'd amaine:
"Weigh vp your ankers, hoise your sailes on high;
For like Ortigian Delos on the maine,
Behold, th'Iberian fleet from shores of Spaine
   Comes hard at hand, and threatens our decay;
   Then arme, aboard with speed, make no delay."

213.
This said, confusedly the souldiers ran
To ships from shore, earth flew about their feet,
Then weigh'd they vp their ankers, and each man
Put to his helping hand, to bring their fleet
Into the seas, the adverse foes to meet,
   And though the spowred winds did them withstand,
   They warped out their ships by force of hand.

214.
Then might they see from farre vpwn the maine,
Like a blacke wood approching more and more,
Their foe-men's tragick fleet, which in disdain
With sound of trumpets, drums, and caymons rore,
Came proudly thundring by the rockie shore,
   And with amazement th'English to affright,
   Their souldiers with loud shouts the hearm's did smite.

215.
They sayling came in order for the fight,
In such a forme on Thetis siluer brest,
As bright-cheekt Cinthia shewes in darkest night,
When stretching out her horns into the east,
She shewes but halfe her face, and hides the rest,
   Which made a crescent moone vpwn the maine,
   Whose horns eight miles in compass did containe.

England's Eliza.

216.

The royall English fleet, which did behold
The martiall order of their nauall traine,
Came sayling forward, and with courage bold,
For England's queene did waue their fleet amaine,
Who in contempt soone waue them againe,
   Whereby defiance with undaunted pride,
   By canons cufie was giuen from either side.

217.

Then bloodie Enyon thundring out aloud,
Made each one thirst in fight his foe t'offend,
And as fierce fire wrapt vp in dampish cloud,
With violent force the sides thereof doth rend,
And with pale lightning thunder downe doth send;
   So England's warlike fleet wing'd with swift gale,
   Broke through the waues th'lberians to assaile.

218.

The drums did beat, the trumpets shrill did sound,
Each adverse force began the furious fight;
Then in the aire the fierce claps did redound
Of canons hidious rore, and with affright,
Fire flashing leapt about and max'd their sight;
   And thus in furie did the fight begin
   With darknesse, horror, death and dreadful din.

219.

The seas did boile, the buxome aire did swell,
A cloake of clouds did ouercast the skie,
The echoing rockes the fight farre off did tell,
The bullets thicke as haile from clouds on high,
From either side in gloomie smoake did fiie,
   And pale-fac'd death viscone of all the throng,
   Above their heads in thicke fumes houering hung.
England's Eliza.

280.
The fight grew fell, and of disaster hapns
In each blacke barke reports loud trumpet sings,
While heau'n records the cannons roaring claps,
And the darke aire with grumling murmurngs
Of whistling bullets, borne on fiery wings,
Whose horrid thunder drown'd the volleies hot
And lesser noise of many a thousand shot.

281.
Oft did the English with the winde and weather,
Charge on their foe-men's ships with hot assay,
Who for their safegard bound round vp together,
Pluckt in their hornes and in a roundell lay,
While on their sides the cannon still did play,
Not daring fight, except to rescue those,
That beaten were by their bold Britaine foes.

282.
Both the bold Howards and lord Sheffield hight,
With Hawkins, Frobisher, and famous Drake,
Braue Barker, Crosse, and Southwell that stout knight,
There, where the foes the fight most hot did make,
Through danger, dread and death their way did take,
And gainst their foes did fierie vengeance spit,
Which did their barks great bulkes in sunder split.

283.
They brake into the midst of Spaine's blacke fleet,
Opposing dreadfull death to win renowne,
As when in skies the earth-bred brothers meet,
When Boreas flying about with stormie frowne,
Doth cuff the clouds, and brings his brothers downe;
For with high spirit, heau'n did their hearts inspire,
T'assaile the foes and burne their fleet with fire.
England's Eliza.

224.
Renowned Howard, England's admirall,
Longing to see the Castile king's disgrace,
Their stoutest hearts with terror did appall,
Who meeting with his foe-men face to face,
Vnto his furie made them all give place,
    Breaking so farre into the fleet alone,
That from the aduerse foes he scarce was knowne.

225.
Where in the midst of danger vncontrol'd,
Vpon the vpper decke he stood on high,
From whence, when as from far he did behold
One of his captains, who did wafting lie
Without the danger of the enemie,
    Out of a cloud of smoake he loud did call,
    Aboue his head waiving his sword withall.

226.
    "O George," quoth he, "why dost thou shun the presse?
    Report renounes thy name for valiancie;
    Then leaue me not alone in this distresse;
    But with yndaunted spirit follow me
    To gaine the palme of glorious victorie;
    So shall that hope, which I conceiue of thee,
    In this daie's bloodie fight not frustrate bee."

227.
The captaine heard, and like a stormie pufte,
That stoopes from clouds and beats the billowes under,
He brake into the fight with cannones cufte,
And came in height of spirit importing wonder
In clouds of smoake, in fierie flames and thunder,
    With whom did many others give th'assay,
    And through Spaine's fleet did furrow vp their way.
England's Eliza.

228.
The foes turn'd head, and made a violent stand,
Both parts stood bent each other to confound;
The cannons thicke discharg'd on either hand
Wrapt clouds in clouds of smoake, which did abound,
And hurl'd their horrid thunder forth to wound;
But fortune on the foes in fight did frowne,
And in her ballance, Spaine's hard lot sunke downe.

229.
With fruits of death the fruitless waues did flow,
The seas did blush with blood, the ayrie skie
Did swell with grones, and wandring to and fro,
In clouds of smoake the grudging soules did die
Of slaughtred bodies, that did floting lie
About the ocean, seeking for their tombes
In hollow rockes and monsters hungrie wombes.

230.
And in the fight, t'increase the foe-men's harmses,
A ruddie flame from th'English fleet did flie,
Which swiftly seased in his spoilefull armes
The stout viceadmirall of th'enemy,
Who proudly bore her loftie head on high,
And with the violence of his shamefull flashes,
Did quickly burne her vpper workes to ashes.

231.
A golden bonfire on the siluer waues
Did flote about, whose flame did reach the skies,
While the poore Spaniard and his captioue slaves,
Seeing their tragick fall before their eies,
Amidst the fire in vaine shriekt out shrill cries;
For th'horrid fire all mercilesse did choake
The scorched wretches with intestine smoake.
Many tall ships, that did in greatness pass
The greatest of our fleet, did fall in fight,
Mongst whom, that faire galeon surprised was,
In which renowned Valdes, that stout knight,
With other captains of approved might,
Did yeeld themselves and all their golden treasure
To noble Drake, to be at his good pleasure.

Three famous conflicts, in three severall daies,
Elizae's hardie captains did maintaine,
And by their valour won eternall praise,
Oft turning into flight the fleet of Spaine,
With dreadfull fire, and cannon's deadly bane,
Who now t'effect what they did vainely boast
Houer'd twixt Calice and the English coast.

There cast they ankor, and conuei'd with speed
Swift notice to the prince of Parma hight,
Who thither should repaire, as was decreed,
And while each aduerse fleet stood hot in fight,
For England he should passe with all his might,
For which intent he had prepar'd before,
Foure hundred ships upon the Belgicke shore.

But noble Seimer in the foe-men's sight,
With Justin of Nassau, that Belgian bold,
And worthie Winter, that undaunted knight,
With their tall ships on th'ocean vncontrol'd,
About the Belgicke strand strong gard did hold,
Whose proud afront the foes did daunt so sore,
That not a ship durst launch from off the shore.
England's Eliza.

236.
Yet the stout prince of Parma fondly led
With hope, that Allen, that false fugitive,
Sent from proud Sixtus to adorn his head
With faire Elizae's crowne, in vaine did strive
With all his power, his purpose to atchieue;
   And vnto Dunkirk came with all his force,
   To put in practise his intended course.

237.
Meane time the fleet, that did expect his aide,
Before French Calice did at ankor lie,
And now the chearefull day began to vade,
And Vulcan's loueley Venus mounting high,
Appear'd for euening starre in easterne skie,
   Whereby both aduerse fleets did cease from fight,
   And rendred place vnto th'approching night.

238.
But when soft sleepe, the careless thoughts did bind
Of others, that secure in cabbins lay,
Each English leader in his labouring mind
Did fashion counsels, how to giue th'assay,
And drine from thence their foe-men's fleet away,
   Who there did purpose by the shore to lie,
   That from the prince they might haue fresh supplie.

239.
Amongst themselves our captaines did agree,
That eight small ships with artificiall fire,
Amidst the Spanish fleet should driven bee
In dead of night, to execute their ire
Upon the foes, that did sweet sleepe desire:
   Which dreadfull stratagem against the foe,
   Stout Yong and valiant Promise did undergo.
England's Eliza.

240.
The time came on, the drowzie night did frowne,
Who clasping th'earth's wide bounds with sable wings,
Upon the seas did powre grim darknesse downe,
While sleepe, that vnto care sweet comfort brings,
In quiet slumber, husht all watchfull things;
   And then the ships all fir'd for the event,
   Amongst the foes with winde and tide were sent.

241.
Through foggie clouds of night's Cymmerian blacks,
A glimmering light the watch did first espie,
Which drifting fast vpon the sea-god's backe,
And to the Spanish fleete approching nigh,
Burst out in flames into the darksome skie,
Glazing the heau'ns and chasing gloomie night,
From off the seas with admirable light.

242.
A sudden puffe with force of powder druen,
Oft blew vp sulphurie flames, in aire on high,
From whence, as if that starres did drop from heau'n,
The liuely sparkes on wings of winde did flie,
Threatning confusion to the enemie;
   Who startled from their sleepe, shriekt out th'alarme
   To every ship, to shun such dismall harme.

243.
Th'Iberians drown'd before in sweet repose,
With feare affrighted from their naked rest,
Their eye-lids wanting weight one winke to close,
Beheld the fire on Neptune's burning brest,
Which trembling horror in their hearts imprest;
   For floting towards them with fearefull flashes,
   It threatened sore to burne their ships to ashes.
Then with disorder every one did cut
Their blacke pitch'd cables, hoysing sailes with speed,
And from the shore to the maine seas did put,
In hope from present danger to be freed,
That did such terror in their bosomes breed,
While on the waues the burning ships bright light,
Did make a sun-shine in the midst of night.

Who being dispersd amongst their nauie came,
And like fire-spitting monsters on the maine,
In sable clouds of smoake and threatening flame,
Did fiercely bellow out their deadly bane;
Which horror th'English nauie did maintaine,
Discharging all their thundring shot together
Vpon th'Iberian foes with winde and weather.

The horrid noise amas'd the silent night,
Repowring downe blacke darknesse from the skie,
Through which th'afrighted Spaniard with blind flight,
His friends from foes not able to descrie,
Vpon the darksome waues did scattered flye;
In which disturbance driven with winde and weather,
Spaine's chiefe galiasse fell soule vpon another.

Which all vnable to escape with flight,
The startled fleet did leave alone forlorne,
Keeping aloofe at sea, all that sad night;
But when from the'east the opall-coloured morn
With golden light the ocean did adorne,
The English fleet Spaine's galiasse did spie,
Which cast vpon a sandie shoale did lie.
Whom captaine Preston valiantly did bord,
Sent from the fleet in his long boat well man'd,
Which with an hundred hardie men was stor'd,
Who to the face of death oppos'd did stand,
About the ship vsing their readie hand,
Gainst whose assault at first thl'Iberian foes,
With proud resistance did themselves oppose.

For Hugo de Moncada, valiant man
With noble courage did the fight maintaine,
Till through his wounded forehead's hardned pan,
A fatall shot with bullets deadly bane,
Made open passage to the limely braine,
Who being slaine, to shun the slaughtering sword,
Most of the residue capt over bord.

Thus great king Philip's mountaine-like galliasse,
In which three hundred stanes lug'd at the care,
And twice two hundred armed men did passe,
Was soone despoil'd of all her golden store
By a small band of men on Calice shore,
Which fiftie thousand duckets did containe,
Of the rich treasure of the king of Spaine.

Meane time the blacke fleet floting on the maine,
The night before disperst with foule affright,
In hope her former purpose to obtaine,
Return'd againe from base inglorious flight,
Arrang'd in order for the nauall fight,
Which in diuided squadrons th'English fleet,
With hot encounter furiously did meet.
England's Eliza.

252.

Who bound vp round together in a ring,
Lay close in their defence against their foe;
But as the southerne blasts in budding spring,
When Auster's swelling cheekes do overf low
In handfuls thicke the blossomes downe to blow;
So thicke and dreadfully did slaughter flie
From th'English fleet amongst the enemie.

253.

Then had th'Iberians dread, their pride did bow,
Their foes by valour brake their nauall round,
And as a torrent from an hill's steepe brow,
Clad in fresh showers and thunder's fearefull sound,
Beares all before it in the plaine land ground;
So did they beat from off their native bounds,
Spain's mighty fleet with cannon's scathefull wounds.

254.

And where the skirmish was propos'd most hot,
Their valiant Drake did breake into the fight,
And though his ship were pierc'd with wounding shot
Twice twenty times; yet withundaunted might
He horrible did plie their sudden fright,
And with wide wounds the hollow keel es did batter
Of three tall ships betwixt the winde and water.

255.

Then in despaire with hands and weeping eies,
To heau'n the wretches prai'd for their escape,
And to some saint of heau'n with open cries,
Each one in blind devotion prayers did shape;
But all in vaine, the gulfie flood did gape,
And in the deepe of his deouning wombe,
Both men and ships did suddenly intombe.
256.

The rest all daunted with such vncomly sight,
From spoile to save their fleet no time did spare,
But hysying saile betooke themselves to flight,
Cursing sterne fate, that brought their fleet so farre,
To be despoill'd in such successesse warrs;
And after all their boasting backe recoile,
With emptie hands vnto their natije soyle.

257.

They heartlesse fled, but in their hastie flight,
Two great galeons of captiue Portuagle,
The huge Saint Philip, and Saint Matthew right,
Great Seymer and stout Winter did so gall
With wounding cuffe of cannonas fierfe ball,
That on the Belgian coast by friends forsaken,
They with their captaines by their foes were taken.

258.

Meane time the English with full saile did plie
The manage of the foes inglorious flight,
And as high stomack'd hounds, that with full crie
Pursue the fearefull game, do take delight
To pinch the haunch behind with eager bite;
So did Eliza's fleet pursue the foes
With shouts of men, and bullets baneful blowes.

259.

They all array'd in warre's vermillion,
Did chase them to those seas of stormes and thunder,
Ouer whose waues in beaus pauillion,
Amongst those many golden worke of wonder,
A dragon keepe two wrathful bernes asunder,
And there they left them, in those seas to drowne,
Returning backe with conquest and renowne.
They gone, the wretched foes in woeful case
Helplesse, perceiving by sterne fortune's doome,
Their action ended in extreme disgrace,
And in fame's stead, for which they forth did come,
Finding but wounds to cure when they came home,
Did curse the ordinance of mightie loue,
Gainst whom with their huge strength in vaine they strone.

But while at sea, all were to labour given,
Securely rigging vp their crazed ships,
Al-seeing loue did worke their banes in heau'n,
For in an instant from his heau'nly lips,
From pole to pole a winged message skips,
And positing round about the earth's great ball,
From th'house of stormes th'Eolian slaues did call.

Then furious Auster, loue's command once given;
With Eurus, Zephyrus, and Boreas rufe,
Stoopt from the cloudie corners of the heau'n
Vpon those seas, and with a violent ruffe,
The tumbling billowes all on heapes did cuss;
And raving against the rockes with bidious rore,
Wropt waues in waues, and hurl'd them on the shore.

Meane while night's curtaines steept in Stygian blace,
The crystal battlements of heau'n did hide;
Then loue did thunder, and the heau'n's did cracke,
Pale lightning leapt about on every side,
The clouds inconstant flood-gates opened wide,
And nought, but mistes, haile, raine, dark stormes and thunder,
Did fall from heau'n vpon the salt seas ynder.
The white froth-foaming flood began to rase,
And enter combate with the fleet of Spaine,
Hurring it head-long on the mountaine-waue,
Now from the shores into the roring maine,
And now from thence vnto the shores againe,
While all the stoutest sea-men quake and quiner,
Lest winde-driven waues their ships in sunder shiner

"Heere strike, strike, sirs, the top mast:" one doth crie,
Another saies: "Vale misene and sprit saile:"
And heere a third bids: "Let the maine sheate flie:"
All fall to worke themselves from death to baile,
Some cut the saile-cloaths, some againe do haile
The saile yards downe, while others pumpe with paine,
Sending the seas into the seas againe.

Heere one vp lifted on a mountaine steepe,
By dreadfull flashing of heau'ns lightning bright,
With pallid feare lookes downe vpon the deepe
Into a pit, as deepe and blacke in sight,
As Tartarus the losethome brood of night,
In whose wide gulfie mouth he thinkes to drowne,
Seeing the ship all topsie turning downe:

Another heere in sandie shoale doth lie,
With mountaine waues on all sides walled round,
And seems from hell to see the loftie skie,
Looking, when wallowing waues with windie bound,
In that deepe pit the vessell would confound,
Till with the lustie waue, the mounting ship
From thence to heau'n doth in a moment skip.
England's Eliza.

268.
The poore sad sailers beaten out of breath
With toilsome paine, and with long watching wore,
Through seare, the feable consort of cold death,
Not knowing, alas, which way themselves to turne,
With wofull cries their fatal fall did mourn,
And cast their eyes to heau'n, where, what was seene,
Was blacke as hell, as if no heau'n had been.

269.
Here the greene billowes bounding against a ship,
Yncauks the keele, and with continuall waste,
Washing the pitch away, the seames vnrrip,
While th'angrie tempest, with a boistrous blast,
Beares the false stem away, springs the maine mast,
And breaking downe the decke, doth passage win
For the next surging sea to enter in.

270.
Then all amaz'd shriekes out confused cries,
While the seas rote doth ring their dolefull knell,
Some call to heau'n for helpe with weeping eies,
Some moane themselves, some bid their friends farewell,
Some idola-like in horrors senselesse dwell,
Here in sad silence one his faint heart showes,
Another there doth thus his seare disclose:

271.
"Thrice happie they, whose hap it was in fight
Against the foes to fall, when others stood:
Ye conquering English, causers of our flight,
Why were your swords not bath'd in my deare blood;
And why did I not perish in the flood?
Where braue Moncada di'd with many more,
Whose bodies now do swim about the shore."
This said, a wave, that neuer brake asunder,
But mounting vp, as if with loftie frowne
It view'd the working of the waters vnder,
Came like a ruin'd mountaine falling downe,
And with his weight the wretched ship did drowne,
Which sinking, in the gulf, did seeke her grave
And neuer more appear'd aboue the wave.

Many more ships did perish in the deepe,
Some downe from top of waues to sandie ground,
All rent and torn the angric surge did sweepe,
Some the winde-turned water whirling round,
In the blacke whirle-poole helpesse did confound,
And some with boystrous billowes bruz'd and battred,
In sunder splitt, aboue the waues were scattred.

The other ships, that huge of building were,
Whose bulkes the billow could not beast asunder,
And whom the furious storme perforce did beare
Amongst the raging seas, now vp, now vnder,
Though through the waues, they wrought it out with wonder,
Yet many against the rockes the surge did beare,
And with the fruitlesse sands some covered were.

Heere fiue at once round set with surging waues,
Sticke fast in quick-sands, sinking more and more,
There fiue againe the furious billow batters,
Being hurried head-long with the south-west blore,
In thousand pieces against great Albion's shore,
Whereby the fruitlesse waues tost to and fro,
With fruits of ship-wracke every where did flow.
England's Eliza.

276.
Here one fast holding by the broken shiues
Of some wrackt ship, to heau'n lifts vp his eies,
There drifting on the mast, one quakes and quiues,
Another heere his outstretcht armes applies
By slight of swimming on the waues to rise;
But all in vaine, the billowes breake in sunder
Above their heads, and beate their bodies vnder.

277.
Heere with sustentiue palmes themselves to saue,
Two crawling vp a cliffe, one backe is borne
By the next surge in seas to seeke his graue,
The other by the billow rent and torne
Vpon the ragged rocke, is left forlorne,
Where in his luke-warme blood he sprawling lies,
And th'haplesse food of hungrie fowles he dies.

278.
The rest, that did the Irish coast obtaine,
And had escap'd the furie of the flood,
By those wilde people wofully were slaine,
The Irish swift of secte, and flest in blood,
Who thicke vpon the shore together stood
With deadly darts, to strike each foe-man dead;
That boeue the waue did beare his fainting head.

279.
Great loue's command, perform'd vpon the foes,
Th'Eolian king call'd home his windes againe;
Then ceast the storme; then did the seas disclose
The armes, the painted robes, and spoiles of Spaine,
Which heere and there did flote vpon the maine,
By England, Ireland, Norway, Normandie,
Where loue did act their fleet's blace tragedie.
England’s Eliza.

290.
For of one hundred thirtie foure faire keele,
But fiftie three did greet their native soile,
Of thirtie thousand men arm’d with bright steele,
The greatest number after all their toilo,
Did perish in great Neptune’s wrackfull spoile,
   And all the prince of Parmac’s mightie bands
Return’d with shame, disgrace and emptie hands.

291.
Thus our Eliza’s boasting enemie,
   Who in vaine pride did blacke their tragicke fleete,
And brought ostents of threatening destinie,
In top of all their hope with shame did meet,
And fell beneath the conquering virgin’s feet;
   Vnable many yeares to cure againe
   The wounds, which in this warre they did sustaine.

292.
   A million of gold, one halfe paid in readie money, the other halfe to be paid when any famous port was taken in England.

Thus Rome’s proud Sixtus, England’s mortall foe,
Who towards the conquest of this emperie,
A million with his blessing did bestow,
And did presage undoubted victorie
With seeming future searching prophesie,
   Nor with his holy blessing, nor his gold
   This mightie fleete from falling could vphold.

293.
But while Rome’s Sixtus, twixt foule shame and feare,
For such great losse gainst fortune did exclaime,
Fame through the world triumphantly did beare
This glorious act in our Eliza’s name,
Who glorifying not in her foe-men’s shame,
   With bounteous grace did vse the victorie
To her proud foes in their captuitie.
England's Eliza.

284.
The baser sort, though made her people's scorne,
Yet of her bountie she from death did spare,
The better sort as her owne liege-men borne,
All common benefits did freely share,
And toke the solace of the open aire,
Whom she, though subjects of a mightie foe,
To his disgrace triumphing did not show.

285.
Under a canopie of gold wide spread
In chariot throne, like warre's triumphant dame,
With crowne imperiall on her princely head,
Borne by two milke-white steeds in state she came
To Paul's high temple, while with loud exclame,
The people in her passage all about
From loyall hearts their anies loud did shout.

286.
Where round about the temple's battlements
Hung th'ensignes of her vanquisht enemie,
As gracefull trophies, and fit ornaments,
T'adorne with state and greater maiestie,
The triumph of her noble victorie,
Which in the people's sight made pleasing shoues,
Who laugh'd to scorne the threatening of her foes.

287.
But she meeke prince dismounting from her throne,
With iuorie-fingered-hands uplifted high,
On humble knees, ascribed vnto none
The honor of this great deed's dignitie,
But to th'Olympian king's great deitie,
Who 'boue the rest, that scepter's states did weeld
Her as his chosen, did from danger sheeld.
England's Eliza.

288.
O matchlesse prince, though thy pure maiden breast
Retain'd that spirit of magnanimitie,
That only brau'd proud Rome's world-brauing beast,
Yet didst thou not with vaunting vanitie
Abuse the glorie of thy victorie:
But after all thy high atchievements wonne,
To heau'n's great King gau'st praise, of what was done.

289.
Which he accepting as an humble show
Of her milde meeknesse, did so glorifie
The fame of this high conquest against the foe,
That her great name, since that great victorie,
Yet liues a staine vnto her enemie;
Yea many that beneath his yoke did groane,
Then su'd for succour at her princely throne.

290.
Prince Don Antonio, heire suppos'd by right
Of all consent to Don Sebastian, slaine
Against the barbarous Moore in bloodie fight,
Exil'd his countrie by the power of Spaine,
Of his hard hap did vnto her complaine,
Imploiring aid at her assistant hands,
To free his countrie from Iberian bands.

291.
The noble virgin with remorsefull eyne,
Viewing that wretched state all rent asunder,
To pitie did her princely heart incline,
And to the seas sent those two sonses of thunder,
That in the world had wrought so many a wonder,
Renowned Drake, and Norrice, worthie wight,
With Don Antonio to obtaine his right.
England's Eliza.

292.
With many a worthie soyledier shipt from shore,
The stormie seas wilde wilderness they plow'd,
And though the wrinkledd waues rouz'd in rough rore,
Began to bandie billowes, waxing proud;
Yet th'English nauie, through tumultuous crowd
Of darksome surges, did swift passage sweepe
Vnto the shores of the Galician deepe.

31. Portugale voyage, taken out of the discourse written by Colonel Anthonie Winklefield, employed in the same voyage.

293.
Where taking land, as bees from cranied rockes
Breake through the clefts, and to increase their store,
About the fields fly every way in flockes:
So from their ships the soylediers more and more
In mightie tumult multipli'd the shore,
Where vncontrol'd themselues they did conioyne
In martiall troopes, and marched towards the Groyne.

294.
Which to defend from spoile the faintyng foes
By need constrain'd, at first forth boldly came,
And in the field our forces did oppose;
But being with furie charg'd by men of fame,
Vnto the towne they backe retir'd with shame,
Whom to the gates the English did pursue,
And with smart stripes did reach them as they flew.

295.
Nor could their strong erected walles withstand
The fierce assaylants, who with nimble sprite
Did scale their bulwarkeres, and by force of hand
Did turne th'Iberians into shamefull flight,
Although with most advantage they did fight,
Of whom five hundred on the dust fell dead,
The rest to th'upper towne amazed fled.
England's Eliza.

296.

The towne surpris'd, stor'd in the same were found
The stern designs of Philip's raging teene;
For every place with shipping did abound,
Which for another fleet prepar'd had beene,
Intended once againe against our queene;
    But by despoiling of this conquered towne,
King Philip's hopes they in despair did drowne.

297.

From hence the victors, in battalia led
To th'upper Goyne by Norris noble knight,
To which the foes had for their safeguard fled,
Did march with speed, and in their foes despight.
Before the towne their warlike tents did pight,
    Where in strong battery many daies they lay,
    And to remove them none durst give th'assay.

298.

Yet by the towne six miles from off the coast,
The count D'Andrada with his armie lay,
Btwixt Petrance and the English boast,
Who boasting with his powers to drive away
The foes from Goyne; yet durst not give th'assay;
    But kept aloofe intrencht within the ground,
    With strong built baracadoes fenced round.

299.

Which, when braue Norris heard, with Darke's consent
Nine regiments amongst the rest he chose,
And whirlwinde-like with furie forth he went,
Marching with winged pace vpon the foes,
On their owne ground with them to bandie blowes,
    On whom hight Edward Norris, lion like,
    Gave the first charge with his sharpe pointed pike.
England's Eliza.

300.
Which with such furious force he did pursue,
That over thrusting downe he fell to ground,
At which advantage in the foe-men flew,
And in the head the valiant knight did wound,
Whom in extremity begirted round
By eager foes, his brother with strong hands
Rescue'd from danger, death, or captive bands.

301.
Then noble Sidnie, Wingfield, Middleton,
Each with his band made in vpon the foes,
Then Hinder, Fulford, and stout Erington,
Stood firm in fight, and in the violent close
Amongst th'Iberians dealt such martiall blowes,
That their chiefe leaders in the field were slaine,
Or wounded, could no more the fight maintaine.

302.
The other fled, and th'English did pursue
With speedie haste, a number fell in chace,
Three miles the dust, with blood they did imbure,
Some downewards groueling did the ground embrace,
Some upewards spread, did shew death's gastery face,
Three miles in compass on that haplesse soile,
Did flow with fruits of blood, of death, and spoile.

303.
The valiant victors, that did backe returne,
Loaded with golden bootie from the chace,
The fruitfull countrey round about did burne
With wastfull fire, which did in euery place
Townes, towers, woods, grous with hungrie flames embrace,
Whose people did from farre behold the flame
With teare-torne eyes; yet could not helpe the same.
Thus fam'd-grac'd Novrce crown'd with victorie,
Into the Groyne returned backe againe,
And with more worth his deed to amplify,
King Philip's standard with the arme of Spaine,
Which from his foes in fight he did constraine,
Before him in his march advanc'd was,
As with his troopes he towards the Groyne did passe.

Where he not long the voyage did delay
For Portugale in Don Antonioe's right;
But left the Groyne and lanch'd off to sea,
Where with that noble earle great Essex hight,
His brother, and stout Williams that bold knight,
He happily did meet, who with full gale
To Portugale together forth did saile.

And in a storme, as people sent from heav'n,
That nation vnto freedome to restore,
They by the tempest gainst Peniche driven,
Vp to the waste in waters raging sore,
Through death and danger waded to the shore;
Where when they came vpon the marine sands,
In spight of foes they martial'd vp their bands.

For when the Conde De Fuentes came
With his proud troopes t'asfront them in the fight,
The valiant Deuorax in Elisae's name
Before the castle, and the towne in sight,
Did charge vpon them with such violent might,
That horror spread, through each Iberian troope,
To servile feare made stoutest hearts to stoope.
England's Eliza.

308.
None durst abide, with foule retreat all fled,
Free passage to the victors open lay,
Who towards the towne did march, from whence, in dread
Of their approch, the people fled away,
And left the towne vnto their foes for prey,
   Whereby the castle taken with the same,
They did possess in Don Antonio's name.

309.
From hence towards Lisbon they did march forthright,
And in the way the noble general
Did enter Torres Vedras, in despight
Of that vaine boast of the proud cardinall,
Who gaue his faith to them of Portugale
   To oppose him in the field, though with delay,
He kept aloofe, and durst not give th'assay.

310.
To Lisbon gates, troopt vp in martiall pace
The English went, and in the suburbs pight
Elizae's ensignes in the foes disgrace,
In hope that Don Antonio would excite
The people to his aide, and in his right
   Shake off the bondage which they did sustaine,
Thereby their late-lost freedome to regaine.

311.
But they ignoble kind of dunghill brood,
With female hearts, more cold in valiancie
Then naked Indians, who with losse of blood
Haue often sought in midst of misery,
To free themselves from servile slauerie;
   When such stout champions in their cause did stand,
Durst not appear to vse their helping hand.

England's Eliza.

312.
The sweet of libertie, for which the Jew
Withstood stout Titus, mightie Caesar's sonne,
The loyall loue, that th'ancient Britaine drew
To those great deeds for Caractacus donne,
When Rome's Ostorius did this land overun,
The heartlesse Portugale could not excite,
To hazard fortune against the foes in fight.

313.
For many daies the English with renowne,
Gainst death and danger did themselves oppose,
And gave assault vnto the chiepest towne,
By their high fortitude t'imbolden those,
That liued in dread of their insulting foes;
And to performe their promis'd force for fight
Against the foes, in Don Antonio's right.

314.
Yet at their hands no helpe to this assay
Eliza's famous captaines could obtaine,
Who wanting power their valour to display,
When the sad prince Antonio all in vaine
The people's helpe had sought, and none could gaine,
Remou'd their martiall power against Lisbon bent,
And towards Cascais vnto their nauie went.

315.
Where valiant Drake with his triumphant fleet,
 Came vp the riuer as it was decreed,
And with the armie at Cascais did meet,
Whose meeting to the foes such feare did breed,
That at their first approch, the towne with speed
And castle both without long batterie,
Did stoope their pride to th'English valiancie.
And where the foes that proudly ranged were
Fast by Saint Julian's, readie arm'd for fight,
Had broad'v misreported, that with fear
Of their approach their foes with soule affright,
Themselves had taken to inglorious flight,
    Undaunted Norrice with his martiall traine,
    Did towards Saint Julian's backe returne againe.

And valiant Essex this bold challenge sent,
As combatant in his great soueraigne's name,
To know, who durst of noble borne descent,
Stand forth amongst the rest to fight for fame,
And trie by blowes the cause, for which they came;
    Or if that eight to eight, or ten to ten,
    Durst tempt their fate in fight like valiant men.

But through th'Iberian armie not a man
Stood forth as combatant in single fight;
For when the generall with his troops began
T'approch their campe, before he came in sight,
They fled away befriended by the night,
    Nor staid they till they made great Lisbon gate,
    Their safe asylum against all adverse fate.

Meane time, that sea-fam'd captaigne worthie Drake,
Twice forte martiall ships well man'd for fight,
In seas did sinke, did burne, did spoile and take;
Mongst whom Saint John de Colorado hight,
Third vnto none in building and in might,
    He burnt with raging fire of flaming brand,
    And sunk her bulks in shoales of swallowing sand.
Thus though the English disappointed were
Of seating Don Antonio in the throne,
Through that base female stomach nation's fear,
Whose sad distress, no future time shall moan,
Though under tyrant's yoke their spirits groan;
Yet fame, the prize on which they meant to pray,
In their swift barks with them they brought away.

And being launch'd into the sea's blacke brest,
By stormie puffe of Auster's blustering blore,
They carried were with violent storme opprest,
'Bout Bayon iles, and towards the sandie shore
With swift winde-swelling sailes their nauie bore,
Where both the generals on the barren strand,
Did with two thousand soldiers put to land.

And as the wealthie fields of ripe-growen corne,
Which ouercharg'd with seed their heads do bow
Are by the reaper downe in handfuls borne,
Who for that meed, which th'owner doth allow,
Still plies his labour with a sweatie brow;
So th'English did with sword and fire despoile
The fruitfull plentie of that pleasant soile.

That strong street-fenced towne, Vigo by name,
In ashe heapes on ground did groueling lie,
And on the swift wings of a golden flame,
The vaile-inriched Boris mounting high,
With blazing shine did glaze the cloudie skie,
While eight miles compassed Vulcan's fierie flame
Dame Ceres gifts did in the vales consume.
Thus grac'd with noble conquest and rich spoile,
The valiant victors with their royall fleet,
Did passe the seas vnto their natuie soile,
Where falling prostrate at their soueraigne's feet,
With glorious prize the virgin they did greet,
The praise of which what they to her had gien,
She gaue againe vnto the King of heau'n.

Vpon the deepes of Neptune's large command,
Many more high exploits were daily done,
And from the vanquisht foes by force of hand,
Many faire ships of many a hundred tunne
Full fraught with wealthie prize were daily wonne,
For forren pens speake wonder of the fame,
And rich spoiles gotten in Elizae's name.

That famous horse-man, launce-fam'd Clifford hight,
The great Heroe noble Cumberland,
About th'Azores in his foes despight
Did scour the seas, and with three ships command
Each famous port vpon that slimie strand:
For those few English, which he did assemble
In three small ships, made all Tercera tremble.

Vpon the walles of Fayall, that strong towne,
Which huge mount Pyco overlookes from west,
He by strong hand with England's crosse did crowne,
And gainst that strand vpon the seas broad brest,
Many great hulkes with blacke rouz'd waues distrest
Of th'Indian fleet, full fraught with prize for Spaine,
He brought to England ore the broad-backt maine.
Yet he alone brave champion ever prest,
For his faire mistresse to defend her right,
Did not triumph on Neptune's watrie breast;
But many more, all men of famous might,
The utmost parts of earth and seas did smite
With loud report that England's bounds did keep,
A virgin, that was ladie of the deepe.

Anno Reg. 38.
Fame-winged Drake and Hawkins, that bold knight,
Upon the coast of Spaine the foes did dare,
When at the Groyne that host lay readie dight
To passe the seas, to dispossesse Navarre,
Gainsst whom th'venholy league did warre prepare;
But while the royall fleet of our faire queene
Appeard at sea, they durst not then be scene.

Nor durst that captaine of the Spanish fleet,
Th'insulting Don Alonso Bacon hight,
Elisae's ships in equall battell meet;
But if by chance he found the ods in fight,
Then proudly would he vse his utmost mights:
Yet England's blacke revenge, alone, at length
Did worke him shame with all his nauall strength.

For famous Greemule sayling neere to Flores
In the Reveenge of our Elisae's fleet,
Obscur'd from sight with th'islands of th'Azores,
Spaine's great Armada did vtimely meet;
Yet with sharpe welcome their approch did greet,
For rich revenge he made upon his foes;
Though he his life in his Reveenge did lose.
England's Eliza.

339.

Ten thousand men in three and fiftie saile,
Did in his barke alone begirt him round,
And fiftene howers space did neuer saile
With thundring shot his ship's weake wombe to wound,
Both him, and her in the ocean to confound,
Whom with twice fiftie men he did oppose,
And did inferre dire slaughter amongst his foes.

333.
The great San Philip, that mount Etna like,
Lay spitting sierie vengeance against her foes,
In fight her entertaine did so dislike,
That she her sad mishap did soone disclose,
And fainting made retreate, to shun foule blowes,
While the amaz'd Iberians struoe to saue
Her leaking wombe from sinking in the wawe.

334.
Like as a goodly hart begirted round,
With eager hounds, that thirst to see him fall,
Tir'd in the toile, turns head and stands his ground,
And with fell blowes the dogs do so appall,
That in the end he makes his way through all:
So noble Greenuile round besieg'd in fight,
Brake through their squadrons with admired might.

335.
Saint Michael hight, and Cysyl's great Ascension,
With th'admirall of the hulkes, three ships of fame,
Each of the which so large was in dimension,
That Greenuils ship, that bore Vindicata's name,
Did seeme a skiff compar'd unto the same,
With crosse-barre shot in fight he did so wound,
That wallowing waues their hugenese did confound.
Against them all she proudly did enthrone,
Vntill her masts were beaten overboard,
Her deckes downe raz'd, her tackle cut asunder,
Vntill her shot and powder, that were stord
In her main'd bulke could scarce one charge afford;
Yea when her sides were euened with the wane
She would not yeeld, but still her foes did brane.

And had not fate inforc'd her noble knight,
To sinke downe senselesse in her hollow wombe,
Euen he alone would haue withstood their might:
But who, alas, can contradict the doome
O wilfull fate, when time prefix'd is come;
From musket's mouth spit forth with vengefull breath,
A fallat shot did wound the knight to death.

And at his death, to shew his mightie mind,
Being from his ship conuei'd amongst his foes,
Feeling the approuch of his last hour assign'd,
As one not fear'd in all externall showes
To leaue this life, whose end should end his woes,
With many looks amidst his enemies
These words he spake, ere death did close his eies:

"In peace of mind I bid the world adew,
For that a sooldier's death I truly die,
And to my royall queene haue paid her due,
Since by my timelesse death I glorifie
My God, and her against her enemie:
Which to my grace, since fame to her shall tell,
With joy I bid the world and her farewell."
England's Eliza.

340.
Thus fame's faire finger in his manly prime,
With honor'd touch in death did close his eyes,
Whose glorie shall outlast the prints of time,
Caru'd in his brow, and like the sunne in skies,
In darkest times each day shall fresh arise;
   For to my verse if heaven such grace do give,
   True noble knight, thy name shall ever live.

341.
His ghost regarlesse did not passe away
Without reuenge: for where in hapless fight,
Unhappie fate did worke his liue's decay,
There Frobisher and Borrough that bold knight,
To his Iberian foes did worke despight;
   For by th'Azores on the stormie maine,
   Many a faire price they daily did obtaine.

342.
The Indian barkes at th'islands they did stop,
For which, that naked people which adore
The king of flames in steepe Olympus top,
With wicked steele their grandames ribs had tore,
To glut their spacious wombes with golden ore,
   Whom Frobisher did send with all their treasure,
   To be dispos'd at his Elizae's pleasure.

343.
Meane time, stout Crosse and Borrough valiant knight,
Against that monster of the fleet of Spaine,
The Madre Dios, did a noble fight
Before those isles many houres maintaine,
Whom by plaine strength, at length they did constraine
   To stoope her pride, and hazarding the might
Of twice three hundred, boorded her in sight.

Hak. in the last part of his second vo-
olume.
Who to enrich their noble enterprise,
With a small world of treasure did abound,
Ten smaller ships fraught with her merchandize,
Which sto'd within her spacious bulke were found,
Arrived safe in Thamis siluer sound;
   For fifteen hundred tunne she did containe,
   And thirtie foot she drew within the maine.

They tooke likewise the Santa Clare in fight,
Which from the Indian east for Spaine was bound,
And on the ilands in their foe-men's sight,
With flames of huagrie fire they did confound
The Santa Cruze, which did with wealth abound;
   Making each creeke and corner of the maine
   To know the rule of their Elizae's raigne.

But should I heere assay to sing of those,
Who to eternifie their soueraigne's name,
Renown'd their swords with fall of thousand foes,
Had I a brazen trump to sound the same,
Which might out-sound th'eternal trumpe of fame,
   Yet not an age drawne out in length of daies,
   Would me suffice to sing their worthie praise.

The Belgian author of that large discourse
Of th'Indian traffickes, truly doth expaline
The matchlesse vertue of their navall force,
And of their high adventures on the maine,
That Saxons Latin muse in loftie straine
   About the world doth sing; yet cruell fate
   Vnto his life did adde too short a date.
England's Eliza.

348.

For when braue spirit did Gilbert's thoughts excite,
To saile the seas to search for worlds vnfound,
This worthie poet with that noble knight
In th'angrie surge, alas, was helplesse drown'd,
And swallow'd vp within the deepe's blacke sound:

Yet life to Gilbert dead, his verse doth give,
And his owne name, in his owne verse doth liue.

349.

But leaue we heere those valiant men, that loue
To die the deepes of Neptune's high command,
To see the wonders of the mightie loue,
And view meane while, with what auspicious hand,
Eliza guides her plentious peopled land,
Whose royall raigne and bountie debonaire,
Time's time to come shall count past all compare.

350.

While those bold martialists, that for their fame
In skill of warre affaires were so renown'd,
Did by their swords immortalize her name,
So those graue aged fathers, peeres profound,
In depth of judgement with wit's laurrell crown'd,
In swaying th'empire's scepter all her daies,
Did guide her steps in the true path of praise.

351.

Like gods in counsell in the state affaires,
They sate in senate skill'd in all things done,
Deeds past and future, carrying by their cares
Through broken sleepe the course of things begun
Striving in dead of night the time t'outrun,
By good advice, by plots, and counsels close,
T'oppugne, preuent, and circumuent their foes.
From whom in care of state the royall maid
Did counsell take, as from the mouth of lome,
Still rul'd with reason, as in power obey'd,
Not led with false opinions fond self-lome,
But by their sound advice did ever prone,
How she with lawes respect might best command,
Seeing lome had put the scepter in her hand.

And with intent, that in her maiden breast
A deepe impression of that pregnant wit
In use of lawes, by use might be imprest,
Mongst the grave senate she did often sit,
And her conceit to consultation fit:
All princes that true vertue's race do run,
The starre-bright light of counsell will not shun.

As the good shepheard with respectfull right.
Of his meeke flocke, drownes not the night in sleepe,
Nor spends the compleat day in his delight;
Who distant farre vpon some mountaine steepe,
Yet never in care them safe from spoile doth keepe;
So her chiefe care, as carelessse how to please
Her owne affect; was care of people's ease.

Well did she know, that who would guard and keepe
The state and counsell of a realme aright,
Not vitally dissolu'd in ease and sleepe,
Or led with loose affection of delight,
They must insist in their owne appetite;
But their state-charged thoughts in cares begun,
Through broken sleepees, and easelesse toiles must run.
England's Eliza.

356.
Yet if she did abstaine from grave affaires,
And found fit time to solace her delay,
With fond delight she did not ease her cares;
But with the ladie muses wont to play,
Or Pallas-like would often spend the day,
    In making wits quaint parlie her best sport,
    Amidst her virgin troope of stately port.

357.
Mongst whom, if some, yet mindfull of her worth,
With iorie fingers touch do chance to turne
These luckie leaues, I only picke them forth
To grace Ioue's wit-bred brood, the thrice three borne
With their great worth, she dead, left now forlorne,
    That by their power, whence I this verse deriue,
    She may in them, and they in her suruiue.

358.
And yee faire nymphs, that like to angels houer
About the palace of our Britaine king,
That locke the hearts of euery gazing louver
Within your lookes, whence all delight doth spring,
Of this faire queene vouchsafe to heare me sing,
    And let her life, to whom she was vnknowne,
    A Mirrour be for them to gaze vpon.

359.
It was, alas that now it is not so,
Praise-worthie deem'd amongst diuinest dames,
In learning's lore their leisure to bestow,
For which the muses to their lasting fames,
In golden verse might eternize their names;
    But now seduc'd with each mind-pleasing toy
    In learning's liking, few do place their ioy.
England's Eliza.

360.
Yet she, that could command all ioyes on earth,
With sweets of judgement suckt from learning, skill
In all delights, did moderate her mirth,
Nor gaue she swinge vnto her princely will
In any pleasure to affect the sill;
   But with true temperance aduis'd aright,
   She best did loue the meane in each delight.

361.
In musike's skill mongst princes past compare
She was esteem'd; and yet for that delight
The precious time she did not wholly square,
And though in daintie dance she goodly dight
Was matchlesse held for her maiestike sprite;
   Yet not in dalliance did she go astray,
   Ne yet in dance did dallie out the day.

362.
She with the seed of Ioue, the muses nine,
So frequent was in her yeares youthfull prime,
That she of them had learned power diuine
To quell proud loue, if loue at any time
In her pure brest aloft began to clime,
   The praise of whom so chaste, and yet so faire,
   Enuie's foule selfe not justly can impaire.

363.
In learning's better part her skill was such,
That her sweet tongue could speake distinctively
Greeke, Latin, Tuscan, Spanish, French, and Dutch:
For few could come in friendly ambasie
From forren parts to greet her maiestie,
   Whom she not answer'd in their nativite tongue,
   As if all language on her lips had hung.
England's Eliza.

364.
Whereby the world did seeme to plead for right
Within her court, where in her princely chaire,
Astrea-like she sate with powerfull might
To right the wrong of those, that in despare
Of other’s helpe, to her did make repaire,
Who after humble sute backe neuer went
Through her court gates without true mind’s content.

365.
Witnesse great Burbon, when that house of Guise
Did counterchecke thee in thy lawfull claime,
In thy defence what prince did then arise,
Or with strong hand, who in fight’s bloodie frame
Did ioyne to wound thy rebell foes with shame?
But England’s queene, who still with fresh supplie
Did send her forces against thine enemie:

366.
To beare the first brunt in those bloodie broyles,
That noble knight, the famous Willoughby,
Did crosse the seas, and through important togyles
Did lead a multitude, whose valiancie
Made France admire our English Britanice,
Whom England’s royall virgin did excite
Vnto that warre t’advauance thee to thy right.

367.
And then to reinforce thy strength’s decay
World-wondred Norrice, Mars his matchlesse sonne,
Did with three thousand soundiers passe the sea,
Who in French Britaine hauing once begunne,
Did not forsake thee, till thy warres were done,
Whom many did in this thy cause insue,
And in thy French dust did their bloods imbrue.
When noble Desmorez, that heroic knight,
To shew his love to arms and chivalrie,
Ingag'd his person in that furious fight
Before that towne, hight Roan in Normandie,
His honor'd brother fighting valiantly;
   Who though but young, yet oft approv'd in fight,
   By a small shot was slain in his owne sight.

And thou brave Sackville, Buckhurst third-borne birth,
Who in these warres didst change thy life for fame,
Although thy bones lie tomb'd in stranger earth,
Yet in thy countrie liues thy noble name
And honor'd friends, that still record the same:
   For though blanke death triumph ore humane breath,
   Yet vertue's deeds do liue in spight of death.

Many more valiant men of no meane birth,
Whose names obscur'd, are yet not come to light,
Being slaine, did falling kisse their mother earth,
And with their foreheads trode the ground in fight,
Against vntruth t'advance great Burbon's right,
   Who by their valour, fighting for renowne,
   Did at the length in peace enioy his crowne.

Thus Albion's mistresse as an angell sent,
The sonnes of men from hel's blacke prince to saue,
The world's usurped rule from Rome did rent,
And from her yoke sweet freedome's comfort gane
To those her neighbours, that her helpe did crave,
   Restoring princes to their royaltie,
   Debas'd by Rome's insulting tyrannie.

The which when that seven-headed beast beheld,
Who proudly treads upon the necks of kings
With indignation his high stomach swell'd,
And of the adulterate sect forthwith he wings
Many bald priests t'enact pernicious things,
Those close confessors, that most use their skill
To worke the weaker sex vnto their will.

373.
With these the bifront Jesuits, that cloake
Themselves in divers shapes, did seek againe,
Against their prince the people to prouoke,
And with pretence of zeal did thynke to traine
Their loyall hearts against their soueraigne:
But these their base attempts tooke no euent,
Seeing prudent Ioue their plots did still preuent.

374.
For at this time, the Irish Oroick,
That bloodie traytor to this kingdome's state,
That with his utmost diligence did worke
With Rome and Spaine to execute their hate,
Being most secure of his untimely fate,
Preuented was, in what he did pretend
In his foule treason by a traytor's end.

375.
For after all his plots at length he came
To proffer service to that roiall king,
Now monarch of this ilke, and in his name,
All Ireland in subjection he would bring,
If he would shroud him with his soueraigne wing;
But he braue prince, t'whom traitors hatefull beeue,
Did send that traitor to our noble queene.
O peerelesse prince, that northerne starre so bright,
Whose shine did guide vs to the port of rest,
When our pure virgin lampe did lose her light,
If from thy sight these ruder times be blesst,
But with one kingly glaunce, graunt this request,
As liuing thou didst honour her great name,
So shee being dead, O king, still lone the same.

Persist, persist, to grace her being dead,
Who liuing did to thee all grace proclaime,
Against her name permit no scandaill spread;
But quell those black-mouth'd monsters that defame,
The Lord's anointed our Eliza's name,
So thy great name 'gainst enuie's biting rage,
May finde like favour in the world's last age.

After this rebel's ruine, in whose life
Rome did such hopefull confidence repose,
Hopeing through him to raise some home-bred strife,
Vnable now t'auenge her on her fees,
By honour'd means in dealing martiaall blowes;
Being senselesse of all princely roialtie
He sought revenge by basest treacherie.

Hight Lopez he, that was for physick's skil,
Highly respected in the prince's grace,
Corrupted was her loued life to spill,
And had the helpe of heauen not been in place,
The roiall virgin in a moment's space
In stead of that, which should have life protected
Had tasted death in poison strong confected.
England's Eliza.

380.
But that great King of heau'n, whose watchfull eie
Did ever guard her maiden brest from taint
Of timelesse death, the drift did soone descrie,
And made false Lopes in the fact to faint,
Depicturing out his fault in feare's constraint,
   Who wretched traytor, for his blacke deed done,
   Blacke death and scandal in the world hath wonne.

381.
Rome's demi-god that can at his dispose
By power from heau'n dispence with villanie,
Thus did his sanctitie of life disclose,
In plotting by inglorious treacherie,
Basely to act a virgin's tragedie;
   Whose force for fight seem'd both on seas and land,
   Too full of death for him to countermand.

382.
Yet once againe with contumelious vaunt,
Invasion threatned was against this land,
Which did our queene's great heart so little daunt,
That to her conquering fleet she gaine command,
Which readie rig'd lay on the English strand,
   To secke the foes for fight in their owne home,
   Thereby to ease them of their toyle to come.

383.
The royall fleet to do the dame's command,
Rig'd vp to dance on Amphitrite's greene,
With war-like museke's sound did launch from land,
To whom, in loue of Albion's honor'd queene,
Then easifull peace Spaine's warre more wisht hath beene,
   Whose bosomes twice ten thousand men did fill,
Train'd vp to tread the paths of warre with skill.

Two noble peers stood up to lead them out,
The one hight Howard he, that with renowne
Gainst Spain's blacke fleet successfullly had fought,
Who now, though honor'd age his head did crowne
With snow-white haires of siluer like soft downe;
Yet in despight of yeares respect did goe,
As generall of the fleet against the foe.

385.
The other peer, whose heart beaun grac'd with grace
Of goodly gifts, was Essex noble knight,
Whom from his youth treading the honour'd race
Of valiant men, true vertue did excite,
T' affect renowne in warre with chiefes delight,
Who best aboue the best of high command,
In this exploit went generall of the land.

386.
These lords, not like the foes, did put in vre,
Their high exploit, who when their blacke fleete came
Did treate of peace, to make vs more secure;
But they each where their purpose to proclaime,
Chose fame for herald to pronounce the same,
Threatning all nations with their dames just ire,
That should as agents with their foe conspire.

387.
Many more nobles drew their willing swords
In this exploit to trie th'Iberian might:
Braue Sussex, Howard, Herbert, valiant lords,
Lord Warden, Burk, stout Veere and Clifford hight,
With Lodowicke of Nassau that stranger knight,
Don Christopher young prince of Portugale,
And Vanderforde the Belgian's generall.
England's Eliza.

388.
From Plimouth port in safe transport of these
And many gallants more, two hundred keele
Did with swift winde cut through the waue sease,
While shee, whose heart th'effects of grace did seele,
Not giving trust vnto the strength of steele,
While England's sacred queene, while shee, I say,
For her faire fleete to this effect did pray:

389.

"Thou guide of all the world, great king of heauen,
That seest all hearts with thy all-seeing eye,
Thou knowest what cause vs to this warre hath driuen,
No thirst of blood, of wealth, or dignitie,
No malice of reusenge or injurie;
But to defend thy truth, we lift our armes
And to preuent our foes intended harmes."
As that thrice happie bird, the peacefull doue,
When the old world groaning beneath the raigne
Of giants raging rule, was drown'd by Ioue,
Brought heau'ny newes of a new world againe
Vnto the Arke, then floting on the maine:
So now a doue did with her presence greet
Elisae's Arke, then admirall of the fleet.

For loe the fleet riding at seas in sight
Of Cadiz towers, making that towne the marke
Of their desire, the doue did stay her flight
Vpon the maine yard of that stately barke,
Which long before that time was term'd the Arke,
Whose vnexpected presence did professe
Peace to the fleet; but to the foes distresse:

Who from the browes of Cadiz loftie towers
With eyes amaz'd, viewing so many a keele
Floting vpon their seas, and seeing such powers
Of martiall people arm'd in brightest steele,
The cold effects of fainting feare did feele,
Through whose faint breasts remembrance now did run
Of ancient wrongs to England's empress done.

The fleete descri'd, the citie high did ring
Each where with horrid sound of shrill alarmes,
In euery street Bellona loud did sing
The song of battaile, and the foes in swarmes
Did throng together in the streets to armes,
While fearefull noise of children's woeful cries,
And women's shrikes did pierce the echoing skies.
England's Eliza.

396.
The gates were open set, out rush't the hoast,
Both horse and foote in armes confused sound,
Who vaunting of their power did vainely boast,
Their fainting foes in bataille to confound,
If their bold seete durst presse the sandie ground,
    Not doubting all their seete, with fire t'insame,
    If from their ships to fight on shore they came.

397.
And in the gulfie mouth of that faire bay,
Where the proud waues doe wash the townes white breast,
The Spanish nauie ready anchoring lay,
All mighty ships bound for the Indian east;
But now for fight themselves they soone address,
    With whom twice ten stout gallies did prepare
    'Gainst th'English seete to trie the chaunce of warre.

398.
The honour'd peeres, great Essex, and his mate
Renowned Howard, Time's swan-white hair'd sonne,
Sitting in counsell wisely did debate,
How by their seete with best advantage wonne,
Against the foes the fight might be begunne;
    For both the castle, forts and towne in sight,
    Did threaten danger in the nauall fight.

399.
But through the windowes of heaven's crystall bowres,
Ione seeing the foemen's force so full of dread,
The citie so well fencing'd with loftie towres;
The sea with faire ships fill'd, the field ore spread
With men of armes, that from the towne made head,
    Did send to shield Elisae's seete from harms,
    His braine-borne childe, th'vunconqueredQueene of armes.
Who to effect th'Olympian god's great will,
About the fleete from ship to ship did flie,
And with such courage every heart did fill,
Inflaming their desires in fight to trie
The valour of the vaunting enemie,
That every one did thirst to trample downe
The loftie pride of Cadiz towring towne.

Now Earle of Suffolk.
The Norfolkke noble duke's undaunted sonne,
Sterne-visag'd like the grim-fac'd god of war,
As was decreed, the fight at first begun,
Who to the foes like some disastrous star,
Or blazing comet did appeare from far;
Shooting forth fierce beames from his blacke ship,
Which with the mounting waues did forward skip.

Each aduerse force to fight drew forth their powers,
And in a golden morn, when Phoebus drew
From off the battlements of Cadixe towers,
The ruddie cheekt Aurora's pearlie dew,
The thundring bullets interchanged flew,
And either side a glorious day to win,
With deadly furie did the fight begin.

The guns, astuns with sounds rebounds from shore
The souldier's eares, and death on mischiefe's back
Spit from the canon's mouth with horrid rore
Flies to and fro in clowdes of pitchie black,
And 'mongst the valiant men makes spoilesfull wrack,
While either part like lions far'd in fight,
None feeling scruple fear of death's aflight.
England's Eliza.

404.

Thus when stout Howard had begun the fight
With many more to quell the foe men's pride,
The noble Devereux, that undaunted knight,
Who stood asterne his ship and wishly ei'd,
How deepe the skirmish drew on either side,
   Nere sta'ld, as was decreed, to second those
In the maine fight, but rush't amongst the foes.

405.

And as we see the sunne sometimes shine cleare
Amidst the skie, then muffle his bright face
In sable clouds, and straight againe appeare,
So famous Essex did aplye each place,
Sometimes incircled round with foes embrace
   He stood in fight, and sometimes seene of all,
He in the forefront did his foes appall.

406.

Which when graue Howard view'd from farre well dight
In noble armes, himselfe he did betake
Vnto his pinnace with lord William hight,
His honor'd sonne, and with their powers to make
The fight more hot, into the presse they brake,
   Where with fresh strength they labour'd to repell
   The foes stout pride, twixt whom the fight grew fell.

407.

So long as faire Aurorae's light did shine,
They equall fought and neither had the best;
But when the fervent sunne began decline
From th'hot meridian point and day decrease,
Feare did invade each bold Iberian's brest,
   Who through the danger of the darksome waue
Did file their foes, themselves from death to saue.
England’s Eliza.

408.
To shun Charybdis iawes, they helpless fell
In Scylla’s gulfe; for after all their braues,
Being all too weake the English to repell,
Their ships they left, and leapt into the waues,
In whose soft bosome many found their graues;
And lest ought good might to their foes redound,
They burnt their ships and ran them on the ground.

409.
The gallies fled, the ships with secret fire
Inflam’d, did burst to shew their burning light;
Then from the shore th’Iberians did retire
Close to their walles, who boasting of their might
In equall ground before did wish for fight;
But now beneath their walles scarce made they stand;
For without fight the victors went on land.

410.
All from the ships did cluster to the shore,
Forth marcht the foote, whose hearts emboldned were
With their late fight, and in the front before
Great Essex breath’d exhorts in euer y care
To charge the foes; and not in vaine to beare
The name of first, but first himselfe to show
In euer y deed, he first did charge the foe.

411.
With such swift force, as when wilde Neptune raues,
And oer the shore breaking his wonted bounds,
Riding in triumph on his winged waues,
Runnes unresisted ouer lands and grounds,
And in his way all in his power confounds;
So from the fleet at shore went th’English downe
To charge the foes inranckt before the towne.
England's Eliza.

412.
The battles joyn'd; but by their valour's might,
The valiant English in one howser's space
Brake through the foe-men's ranks, who turn'd to flight;
Did turne their backes and gane the victors place,
Who to the towne pursu'd with speedie chase,
Whose walles th' Iberians flying from the field
Against their foes did long to make their shield.

413.
And being entred with confused cries,
The gates were shut, and in the towne each where,
A divers noise about with horror flies;
Then in the streets thicke troopes of men appeare,
Some to the gates, some to the walles with feare
Amazed runne, and euery hold about
They stuffe with men, to keepe their foe-men out.

414.
Meane time to triumph in proud Cadiz fall,
Illustrate Essex did approch the towne,
Where scaling ladders laid vnto the wall
Were fill'd with men, who climing for renowne,
Did hazard death from off the walles cast downe:
For from th'assault to force them to retire,
Thicke fell downe darts, huge stones, and dreadfull fire.

415.
The fearefull cries of men on either side,
Rung through the towne, as they the walles did scale,
Not long the bold defendants did abide
Th' assailants by their prowess did preuaile,
The foes gaeue backe, their fainting hearts did faile,
Who left the walles, and through the streets did runne,
With ruthfull tidings how the walles were wonne.
England's Elixir.

416.
Upon the battlements, the blood red cross
Appeared in sig' t, and from the walls downe went
The English troopes, and to the gates did passe,
Where th'iron bars in sunder they did rent,
Beate downe the posts, and all the iewes brent,
    And passage wide to them without did win,
To whom the houses farre appear'd within.

417.
Then all the host, led by that aged lord,
The sea's chiefe admirall, rushed through the gate,
And through the towne with fierie shot and sword
Did force their way in euery street and strait,
Even to the publike market, where of late
    The foes had purpos'd in the king's highstreet,
To make their commons reinduous to meet.

There now the battell fresh againe begun,
For making head vnto that place, the foe
To reinforce their strength, in troopes did run,
While others downe from houses tops did throw
Raine and death on th'English bands below,
    Where fighting against such odds, they haplesse lost
Sir John Wing.  Braue Wingfield hight, a leader in the host.

419.
On whose dissolved life, such deepe remorse
    The English tooke, that all with loud exclame
Rusht on th'Iberians bold, and did enforce
Their speedie flight, then furie did enflame
The soldiers hearts, and in the bloody game
    Of raging Mars, remorseless they were all,
To wraek revenge for worthie Wingfield's fall.
England's Eliza.

490.

Like angric lions rob'd of their deare yong,
The houses round about they now invade,
The portals, posts and thresholds downe are flung,
The gates and walles of stone so strongly made,
And doores fast barr'd with earth are leveell made,
And all high turrets and strong chambers shake
With th'hot invading, which the soldiers make.

491.

The inward rooms are fill'd with wofull sounds,
And wailing noise of folke in wretched plight,
The buildings all with larums loud rebounds,
And women with yong infants in affright,
Through chambers wide shunning the soldier's sight,
Runne heere and there to seeke some couert place,
To hide themselves from angric Mars his face.

492.

About the parent's knees, the children swarmes,
Calling in vaine for helpe with pitious cries,
The spouse fast clips her husband in her armes,
In whose sad brest his cold heart fainting dies,
Seeing the armed men before his cies,
Stand with bright swords in thicke tumultuous crowd
At th'entrie doores, crying out with clamors loud.

493.

But th'English all, that never vse to lift
Their hands against a yeelding enemie
By nature milde, not proud of fortune's gift,
Did not insult upon their misery,
But with milde hand did vse the victorie,
And after fight they all abhorring blood,
Did only tend the spoile of golden good.
England's Eliza.

Both the braue generals, by a strict command
About the towne, this mercie did proclaime,
That none thenceforth should use the force of hand,
Nor offer wrong to any virgin dame,
That would sweet beautie keepe from lustfull shame,
Which vnrepro'd edict amongst all men,
Through th'English host inviolate hath been.

Amongst the captuus not the basest mate
With any sad designe they vexed sore,
The female sex vnoucht inviolate
Did freely passe with all that golden store
Of chains, and gemmes which they about them bore,
And all religious folke did find like grace,
Free without ransome to depart the place.

Thrice valiant victors, euer may my rimes
Survuiue on earth, that in their life may lune
This famous conquest to all future times,
That from the best, that for true praise do striue,
All men to you the laurell wreath may giue,
Which that milde mercie, which you then did show,
Doth more deserue then conquest against the foe.

After the souldier had return'd from spoile
Loaden with riches of the ransackt towne,
To yeeld fit compensation to the toile
Of each man's pains, with fanour or renowne,
The generals did each souldier's merit crowne,
And gaue to many a well deserving wight
That noble order of true martiall knight.
England's Elysia

428.
That noble order, which in antique time
In top of fame's high tower tooke chiefeest place,
To which by vertue valour's steps did clime;
Was then no base mind's meed, that nere had grace
T'enue fame's seeting in true vertue's race;
Though now the aged world to dotage grownne,
This noble order scarce is truly knownne.

429.
But now to sing the spoile and last decay
Of that faire towne by her owne folke forlornne,
The host all readie to depart away,
Intending first in funerall flames to burne
Her fatal pride, and all her pompe overturne,
Did in thicke concourse cluster to confound,
Her high top towers and eu'n them with the ground.

430.
In number like the golden flowers in spring,
In forme like furies of the Stygian cave:
The soldiers high on houses tops do fling
Their burning brands, and round do range and rane,
To burie that faire towne in ashie graue,
While hungry flames borne vp on golden wings,
Flies through the aire, and far their splendor flings.

431.
Then the faire wals inricht with painting's grace,
And portals proud of gold are all cast downe,
Sterne Mulciber in his bright armes embrace
Doth graspe the towres, and on th'inflamed towne
Through rolling clouds of smoake doth sternely frowne:
Whose fierce fiers climing houses far away,
By foes are scene to worke the towne's decay.
England’s Eliza.

432.
Thus burnt Spaine’s Cadiz fam’d for that faire place,
Where great Alcides, when his sword did tame
The triple Gerion borne of tyrant’s race,
Did fixe his pillars t’eternize his name,
With ne plus ultra grauen on the same;
Thus did it burne captiu’d in English yoke,
And all her fame lay stifled in the smoke.

433.
After the spoile, exchange of captiues made
For those, that Spaine had long captiu’d before,
Each souldier’s prize aboard the fleet conuei’d,
Leaving the towne despoil’d of all her store,
All made returne unto the ships at shore;
At whose depart such after-signe was seene,
As had before at their arriuall been.

434.
For hoysing saile at sea, loe as before
Vpon the Arke a doue her flight did stay,
With which departing from th’Iberian shore,
She from the same departed not away;
But kept her station till that happie day,
That all the fleet did with the compleat hoast
Arrieue in triumph on the English coast.

435.
Thus when vpon Eliza’s royall brow,
Time’s honor’d age in print had set his signe,
Euen then her arme Spaine’s stiffened pride did bow
And when her youthfull daies did most decline,
Then did the King of heau’n to her assigne
The euer youthfull wreath of sacred bay,
In signe of triumph to her liue’s last day.
England's Eliza.

436.
The utmost kingdoms canop'y'd of skie,
Did bear record of her triumphant fame,
The vastest ocean, that did farthest lie,
With each small creeke and hauen in the same,
Did then resound the praises of her name:
    Which to her friend's defence, her foemen feare,
    Her crosse-crown'd fleet about the world did beare.

437.
For all sea-bordering townes, that subject were
Vnto the crowne of Rome-supporting Spaine,
Who high their breasts aboue the waues did beare,
Did tremble to behold the crookt stern'd traine
Of English ships still floating on the maine;
    For towards the sea's greene bounds they often bore,
    And many townes destroy'd vpon the shore.

438.
Renowned Clifford on the fruitfull deepe
Like Joue-borne Perseus, that illustrate knight,
In his swift Pegasus, the seas did swepee,
And after many a prize surpriz'd in fight,
To make the land record his powerfull might,
    He at that time with his triumphant host,
    Got noble conquest on the Indian coast.

439.
Fortune with fame his high attempts did crowne,
And his dread name the foes with feare did fright,
Saint John de Porta Rico that strong towne,
And her faire castle, which did seeme in sight
Impregnable gainst all assaults in fight,
    His hands to heapes of fruitlesse dust did burne,
    And with her spoile he home did safe returne.
England's Eliza.

440.
The valiant English still did worke much woe
Vnto the foemen both on seas and land,
Etta still did triumph ore the foe,
And day by day vpon the English strand
Arriu'd rich prize surpriz'd by force of hand,
Whereby th'Iberian folke made poore and bare,
In heart did curse the causer of the warre.

441.
But leave we heere of forren deeds to sing,
And turne we home at sound of those alarms,
Which on thy shores, O England, high did ring;
And let vs waile, alas, the wofull harms,
Which did befall that valiant man of armes,
Who after all his glorie and renowne,
Beneath too hard a fate felt fortune's frowne.

442.
Tyrone that traytor, from whose treacherie
The first chiefe cause of his annoy did spring,
Disloyall to Elizae's maiestie;
Had now begun to set the war on wing
On th'Irish coast, whose townes and plaines did ring
With sad report of bloodie actions done,
By the bold rebels and the base Tyrone.

443.
An. Reg. 41. Tidings whereof to England's rockie bound,
Borne ore the ocean's backe on wings of winde,
The shores with Mars his rugged voice did sound,
And noble Essex generall was assign'd
To crosse the fruitfull deepe, whose honor'd minde
Did wing him forward with desire of fame,
On earth to purchase an immortall name.
England's Eliza.

Yet towards the coast when he this journey tooke,
The king of flames that with delight did crowne
All that faire day before, did change his looke,
The heau'n did thunder loud, the clouds did frowne,
And in the way Joue cast pale lightning downe,
  Presaging sad euent of things to come,
  Which tooke effect at his returning home.

445.
At his returning home, when his deare dame
The great Eliza, with maiesticke frowne
Gan change milde looks, when fortune foe to fame
Did turne her wheele about, and hurrying downe
His towring state, all hope of life did drowne
  In death's deepe waues, whose most vntimely end
  Both heau'n and earth lamenting did befriend.

446.
For that blacke morn, when he without appall
To lose his life vnto the blocke was led,
The sunne in heau'n, as for his Phaeton's fall,
In sable clouds did hide his golden hed,
And from so sad a sight away he fled;
  While wofull heau'n with dolefull teares sent downe,
  For his sad fall the world in woe did drowne.

447.
He being dead, being dead, alas, and gone,
That hopefull lord, hight Mountjoy, did succeed
As generall in the warre against Tyrone;
To whom all-seeing Joue tooke speciall heed,
And did direct his hand in euery deed,
  Who would not haue Elizae's unstain'd praise,
  Distain'd by rebels in her aged daies.
England's Eliza.

448.
For what hath she in her affaires decreed,
Euen to her royall liue's last breathing space,
In which Joue did not euer grace her deed,
Yea now when ripe yeares rugged prints had place
Vpon the fore-front of her princely face,
Then did her gratious God with compleat praise,
Perfect the vpshot of her aged daies.

449.
The happie Belgians on the marine coast,
In a pight field against a prince of name,
In person fighting 'midst his royall host,
Did purchase conquest, captuies, gold and fame,
By th'only aid which from Eliza came:
Without whose helpe on which their hopes did build,
All had been lost, the foes had won the field.

450.
For when the Austrian prince on Newport Sands,
After the slaughter of the valiant Scot,
Had guen charge vpon the aduere bands,
When by thicke volleys of their murdring shot,
Many stout men had drawne death's fatall lot;
Then many Belgians faining fled away,
And left their friends to win or lose the day.

451.
'Mongst whom the English chiefly did sustaine
The furious brunt of that important fight,
Where many worthie men were helplesse slaine,
Who rather chose to make that day the night
Of death's approch, then turne their backs for flight;
Who all had fallen by death without remorse,
Had not the Veres renew'd their fainting force.
England's Eliza.

452.
For the bold brothers both the valiant Veres,
Deepe wounds did purchase to regaine the day,
The one breath'd comfort in the soul'diers cares,
While th'other through the foes with violent sway
Of his horse troopes did force a dreadfull way,
Through which the Belgians that before had fled,
Might 'gainst the fainting foes againe make head.

453.
The foemen fled, the ground was stro'd with harmes
Of their mishap, their duke fled fast away,
Leauing his horse of honour and his armes
Vnto the victors to remaine for ay,
As signes of conquest and that glorious day,
Which by Elizae's auxiliarie traine,
Then agents there the Belgians did obtaine.

454.
Thus to the life of our triumphant dame
Time in her reigne no yeere did multiplie,
Which fortune did not dignifie with fame,
Or praise of some illustrate victorie;
'Gainst Rome, 'gainst Spaine, or th'Austrian enemie,
'Gainst whom that houre that she expir'd her breath,
She di'd victorious in the armes of death.

455.
For when the Austrian duke with his proud host,
Atrides-like laid siege to little Troy,
And by a solemnne vow did vainely boast,
Not to depart vntill he did destroy
That English towne; yet to his owne annoy,
He there did lie while th'horses of the sunne,
Their yeare's race thrice about the heauen had runne.
For England's Hector and his valiant brother,
That time's young Troilus did the duke appall,
And his best hopes in blood and dust did smother;
Yea many a thousand at that siege did fall
In death's blacke grave before the towne's strong wall,
Which while the Belgian patronesse did liue,
Unto the foes in fight the foile did gieue.

And as our queene in foraine-bred debate,
From hence to heauen victorious tooke her flight,
So here at home before her lieue's last date,
Triumphant sounds of belles the starres did smite,
And bright bon-siers the darkesome euens did light
With gladsome flames for worthy victorie,
Atchieu'd against the Irish enemie.

Yea, when the hand of vnemorsefull fate,
Had euen spun out the thred of her lieue's clew,
Tyron, that long disturber of her state,
With shame of his offence remorsefull grew,
And on his knees did then for mercie sue:
That dying, she might say with vading breath,
I left no foes vnuanquisht at my death.

But woe, alas, the dust-borne pompe of earth,
Made thrall to death, returns to dust againe;
All vnder heauen, that haue their being and breath
Of nature's gift, no longer doe remayne,
Then nature doth their brittle state sustaine,
The prince and swaine to death are both alike,
No ods are found when be with dart doth strike.
England's Eliza.

460.
For I, that whilome sung with cheerefull breath
Her roiall reigne, whose like no age hath scene,
Now cannot sing; but weep to thinke how death,
All pitlesse of what before had beeene,
Did rob poore England of so rich a queene;
    And if I sing, I must in my sad song,
Exclaime on death for doing vs such wrong.

461.
For doing vs such wrong to dim the light
Of England's virgin glorie then decaid,
Which, while heauen's light the earth's broade face shall smite,
All virgins shall admire and still vpbraid
That Tarquin death, with death of such a maide:
    For her, whose virgin blood no Tarquin's staine,
Did euer taint, O death, thy dart hath slaine.

462.
That day shee di'd, which to her roiall sire,
To great Plantagenet hath fatall been;
That day, when fates did his sad death conspire:
    That day when Edward dead was seeene, Thursday.
That day when Mary left to be a queene:
    That day from vs did our Eliza goe,
That day, that tyrant death did worke our woe.

463.
But why do we 'gainst death vs such complaint,
Seeing not in youth, then short of yeares to crowne
Her head with age, she di'de by death's constraint,
But ripe in yeares, and loaden with renowne;
Made mellow for the graue, she lai'd her downe:
    And leaving earth that part, which earth had giuen,
On faith's strong wings she tooke her flight for heauen.
England's Eliza.

Heere Clio ceast, her lute no more did sound,
But in a moment mounting from the ground,
She vanisht from my sight, and with her fled
The place of pleasure which mine eyes had fed;
With which all had been lost, if in minde,
My dreame's Idea had not stai'd behinde.

FINIS.

VOLUME THE LAST.
